"Teachers are paid well here, at par with public school teachers, which is very different than in the United States," said Golombek, who two years ago became the principal of Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns Education Centre on Neptune Drive. "It definitely affects the quality and availability of teachers in the States."

Also, he said, having worked in both Canada and the United States, he has seen "much more of a need to sell Jewish education in the States as a concept. It's not a given that you'll send your kids to afternoon school or day school. For many more families in Toronto, it's a given."

For him the conference was valuable for allowing him to "recharge Jewishly," interact with colleagues who share his passion for Jewish education, and attend sessions about new technology, some of which Associated is implementing this year with the purchase of new "smart boards."

"It really brings another dimension," Golombek said about the boards. "You have the entire World Wide Web at your fingertips. Accessing information becomes instantaneous."

Also, he added, teachers can facilitate shared writing experiences and print the results for everyone, or can e-mail everything that appears on the board to students who are absent.

Anne Andrew, principal of the religious school at Vancouver's Temple Sholom, was also interested in the technology sessions, because of technology's familiarity and relevance to kids, she said.

She noted, however, that the situation for Jewish educators in Vancouver differs from that of their counterparts in Toronto. Although she said she is paid adequately and feels respected for her work, she doesn't believe that is the case across the board.

"[A Jewish educator] isn't considered something that kids aspire to be. We definitely need to work on that."

A veteran of almost a dozen CAJE conferences, Andrew said she attends so she can connect with educators from across North America.

"We are quite isolated in Vancouver," she said. The conference increases her energy and enthusiasm for the upcoming year, she added. "There's a sense of connection to something big and important in terms of what we're doing."

Held, who ran the teen program and was a presenter at the conference, said that Toronto is unique because of its public university (York University) that has a Jewish teacher training program.

"That's almost unheard of," Held said. "Having a program like the one at York creates a structure for Jewish education in the city. That creates a community of educators, which you don't find at that level in other communities."

Rachel Cooper, 21, was one of 26 students at CAJE as part of its Schusterman College program. A social work student at the University of Waterloo who has taken time off to serve as youth director at Toronto's Beth Sholom Synagogue, she returned from St. Louis with programming ideas and "a host of networking ideas. It's very exciting."

Like Held, Cooper believes that informal Jewish education is an up and coming field, and "quite fulfilling."

"I'm seriously considering a career in Jewish education," she said.

Active senior continues to walk and raise funds for Israel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

"Although I live in Canada, one of the best countries in the world, my heart is in Israel where my parents are buried and where all my family live," says Rachel Kanner, who will turn 90 this fall.

Kanner, who supports many Israeli charities and has frequently visited Israel, is proud that at her age, she still participates in the United Jewish Appeal walk-a-thons for Israel, as she has done for 33 years.

A sprightly woman with an outstanding memory and clear, penetrating blue eyes, she says she has "raised a lot of money for Israel. Some years, I raise $2,000 to $3,000 for the UJA."

This, she says, makes her a Chai Walker. "You get a special T-shirt for the walk, and you are recognized at a special ceremony that takes place before the walk begins."

Kanner adds with some regret that since the onset of a spinal problem five years ago, "I don't walk all the way anymore. But I still raise all the money."

Born Rachel Blum in Eden, Germany, in 1917, Kanner recalls the events that began in 1933, when she was a teenager and the boycott against Jewish stores was posted.

Her father, Samuel Blum, a Zionist who founded the Mizrachi organization in Germany, was the chief rabbi for the province. Recognizing the immediate danger, her parents sent her and her two younger siblings to Holland to stay with their aunt.

Rachel Kanner

Shortly after they arrived in Holland, her father came and took her sister and brother back to Germany. Kanner remained in Holland to learn a trade in preparation for aliyah.

She returned to Germany in 1936 to begin training, physically and mentally, at the Hachsharah at Lubeck, an hour from Hamburg, to prepare her for the move to what was then Palestine. Unfortunately, after a medical examination, she was told that she was not physically fit enough to go there.

She recalls the horrors of 1938 and the nightmare of Kristallnacht. The night before Kristallnacht, her father went with a synagogue official to Berlin to purchase religious material. On Kristallnacht, her mother and the children woke up around 4 a.m. to see the nearby shul burning.

They wanted to put out the fire, but the Nazis entered their house and saw her mother trying to lock their glass cabinet. The Nazi officer told her, "You don't need to lock your cabinet, we do not steal because we are not Jews."

They had to leave their house, and when they returned later, all their possessions and hundreds of her father's valuable books were gone.

"Then they came for us and took us to a collection area for Jews," Kanner recalled. "The next day, we could go home, but we found that the house was uninhabitable, for when they hosed the shul our house was also swamped."

They went to the old folks' home, and on Shabbat, the Nazis came looking for her father, who was still in Berlin. They wanted his picture. They found him in Berlin and took him to prison, and 10 days later, to Camp Sachsenhausen.

"My mother acted very quickly," Kanner says. "She went to the authorities and received a certificate for his release and we all quickly left Germany."

The family left for Holland, and then her mother and father and two children left for Palestine. Kanner went to England where her older brother, Hugo Blum, lived, and she worked as a domestic for a rabbinical family.

"Seven weeks after my family arrived in Israel, my mother died of stress. We were sitting shivah in many places," Kanner says.

In 1939, England declared war and Kanner lost her job. She once again began to prepare to go to Palestine as a pioneer. In England, she worked with children from the Kindertransport as a madrichah (leader).

After the trauma of the war years, in 1945, she says, "I was lucky to be one of the first to go to Palestine."

Two years later, she met and married Shimon Zimmerspitz, a survivor who had his back broken during the Holocaust. For health reasons, he was advised to move to a colder climate, and in 1952, they moved to Canada. Their marriage failed, and in 1967, she married William Kanner. He died in 1979.

Throughout the years, Kanner has worked for the restoration office. She went to the Hebrew teachers seminar in Toronto and studied in Israel on a scholarship for a year. She taught at Associated Hebrew Day Schools, Adath Israel and Beth Sholom. After retirement, she taught yoga.

Living on her own, Kanner admits that she has slowed down somewhat, but emphasizes that she will continue to walk for Israel and to raise as much money as she can.

She speaks of her good luck in meeting a Russian family on a trip to Israel two years ago. "I was adopted by them and I now have additional family who look after me as much as possible. I am very grateful for the good things I have in my life.

"And I am grateful that I am here today, and as long as God lets me, I will continue in my way of life and continue to collect money for Israel. And whoever helps me, shares in my mitzvah."

Liberal hopeful Coulon backpedals on Hamas stance

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — At a meeting with Jewish community representatives last week, Jocelyn Coulon, the Liberal candidate in the Sept. 17 federal byelection in the riding of Outremont, retracted his previous position that the international community should not isolate Hamas.

Coulon, an academic and frequent writer and commentator on international affairs in the francophone media, indicated he changed his view because Hamas has not met three conditions: renounced violence, recognized Israel's right to exist and accepted the Oslo accords.

When he wrote in favour of dialogue with Hamas, "through Palestinian [Authority] President Mahmoud Abbas," he said he believed it was possible the group would adhere to those terms.

"Today, I state that Hamas has not met those conditions and, by that fact, dialogue is not possible with this terrorist group."

However, Coulon cautioned his critics against taking what he has written in the past out of context by selecting "five or six words out of a 1,000-word column.

"Read the column in its totality to understand its logic and argument," Coulon said in response to a question from William Dery, a past president of the Communauté Sépharade Unifiée du Québec.

Coulon later told reporters that his fundamental position on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is in line with Liberal policy and that of the Quartet of Mideast peace sponsors (Russia, the United States, the European Union and the United Nations): negotiation toward a two-state solution.

He said he visited Israel in 1993 and got a sense of how close the small country's enemies are. "What is important is to show solidarity with Israel," he added.

As recently as February of this year, Coulon wrote in La Presse: "Westerners would have done better by not isolating Hamas, no matter how repugnant its positions on Israel are. They made a mistake. Marginalizing Hamas and trying to prevent it from exercising its electoral mandate won't eliminate it from the Palestinian political stage."

Coulon's earlier writings were strongly critical of Israel and the United States and accused them of excessive force, including against Muslim civilians. For example, in a September 2004 article titled "The Massacre of the Muslims," which is still available online, he wrote: "Each day, a billion Muslims see Americans, Israelis and their allies humiliate or pulverize tens of their fellow civilians."

Coulon is a Université de Montréal professor who has written frequently in recent years on the Middle East in La Presse as well as Le Devoir, and has appeared on television and radio, although he is little known to anglophones.

He was personally named in July by Liberal leader Stéphane Dion, who said he wants him to play a role in moving Canada's foreign policy away from "the current Conservative government's Republican-style approach."

The multicultural Outremont riding is a Liberal stronghold, with the exception of one Progressive Conservative win in the 1980s. About 10 per cent of the electorate is Jewish, many of them chassidim.

B'nai Brith Canada immediately called for Dion to withdraw the nomination because of Coulon's "hostile attitude" and "well-documented anti-Israel bias… that appear[s] out of step with current Liberal policy," the organization said. CJC-QR chair Victor Goldbloom said after the meeting that Coulon's remarks had gone some way toward "clearing the air.

"Whereas in the past he had hoped a dialogue with Hamas could be opened, he now recognizes that is not possible because certain conditions have not been met. It was a clear answer and a helpful one."

He said Coulon's opinions have "caused concern" over the years, but CJC did not object to his candidacy for the pragmatic reason that it is likely that he will win, and the Jewish community will need to have a relationship with him.

Candidate 'appears to have changed view'

B'nai Brith legal counsel Moise Moghrabi said that what Coulon now says is different from what he wrote in the past, but he is not completely convinced of his sincerity.

"He appears to have changed his views. He says he has had a chance to rethink the issues, and I am glad to hear that. The next step is to see if he will follow through."

The meeting also heard from other candidates: Conservative Gilles Duguay, a former diplomat; New Democrat Thomas Mulcair, who was a Quebec Liberal cabinet minister; and the Bloc Québecois' Jean-Paul Gilson, a psychoanalyst.

The Belgian-born Gilson, who noted that his family had been in the resistance during World War II, expressed his strong support for Israel, as did Mulcair, who spoke of his wife's Turkish-Jewish ancestry.

"It is not enough to support Israel's right to exist, but to recognize that is the only functioning democracy in the Middle East that can become a beacon to the countries in the region. Israel does not need moral lessons. It is a state of morality… The Palestinians also have the right to live in peace and security."

Duguay lauded his leader Stephen Harper's "courage" in supporting Israel's military response to attacks from Hezbollah in Lebanon last year. He reiterated that Israel has "the right to defend itself by all legitimate means and that sometimes means a military one," he said.

Duguay said the federal government should spend $300 million, if necessary, not only $3 million, on helping communities at risk with their security costs.

Paris je t'aime הוא נסיון קולנועי מיוחד: נתנו למיטב הבמאים לעשות כל אחד סרטון בן חמש דקות שמוקדש לאחד משמונה עשר הרובעים של פאריז. התוצאה מדהימה. לא יאומן מה אנשים מוכשרים יכולים לעשות עם חמש דקות סיפור!! עוד עשר בסולם קורן.

Hairspray הוא סרט לפי המחזמר ההוליבודי על תחנת טלביזיה לבני נוער בבולטימור של שנות השישים. אנרגיה נהדרת ושירים מקסימים. שווה ללכת רק כדי לראות את ג'ון טרוולטה שמופיע בתפקיד של אמא. תצאו עם חיוך גדול. תשע בסולם קורן.

CBC shines light on Israel's solar power innovations

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

With so much media attention focused on Israel's entanglement in Middle East conflict, it's refreshing when journalists file a story on other, positive developments within the Jewish state, including its booming science and technology sector.

Recently, the CBC honed in on Israel's solar energy industry and important Israeli research that may help countries around the world harness the power of the sun to provide cost-effective, pollution-free energy.

On Aug. 15, CBC.ca ran "Looking to the sun," a feature article by CBC Radio reporter Tom Parry, subtitled "Revolutionary solar power from Israel."

Parry takes readers inside the Ben-Gurion National Solar Energy Research Center, based in the Negev Desert. He writes: "[T]he work going on behind [the centre's] doors is at the cutting edge of solar technology. It could change the way we produce energy – in theory, at least."

Parry interviews the centre's head, Prof. David Faiman, who remarks that "the focus of his work is 'the Dish.' The Dish appears at first glance to be a giant satellite ground station. In fact, it is a giant mirror. And what this mirror does is focus the sun's rays onto one single super-heated point."

Faiman explains: "By concentrating the light a thousand times, we were able to produce 1,500 watts from a cell that normally gives only one watt."

> 'A thousand megawatts is 10 per cent of Israel's present generating capacity… It's enough for something like a million people'

Faiman's ability to use such concentrated sunlight and capture it on a very durable solar panel has potentially huge implications if his technological breakthrough gets translated into full-scale production.

Parry covers another Israeli company, Solel Solar Systems Ltd., based in Beit Shemesh, near Jerusalem, whose solar technology is producing "formidable amounts of electricity" in California's Mojave Desert.

He notes: "And just recently, [Solel] signed a contract to build another massive expanse of mirrors that will be the world's largest solar generating plant."

Says Solel president Avi Brenmiller: "That's the largest solar plant ever built in the world. It will be supplying power to 400,000 families. And we plan to build more plants of that size."

Solel has also sold its product to Spain, and is looking at India and China as potential customers.

Parry notes: "What disappoints both Faiman and Brenmiller is that while Israel is quickly becoming a world leader in solar technology, Israel has been slow to embrace solar energy on a wide scale. Most Israeli homes are equipped with solar water heaters, but the bulk of Israel's electricity is produced at coal-fired generating stations. Faiman attributes Israel's reluctance to go solar to nervous politicians.

"'There is a reluctance of governments to do anything new,' he says, 'That is a fundamental problem of governments all over the world. No politician wants to risk doing something that nobody's ever done before. Because if it doesn't work, it's the end of his political career.'"

Israeli solar power technology was also featured in an Aug. 21 report by Peter Armstrong for CBC Newsworld and the National.

Host Ian Hanomansing introduced the piece as being about "a remarkable energy experiment."

Armstrong also interviewed the Ben-Gurion Centre's Faiman, who "says he would need just 12 square kilometres to create 1,000 megawatts of energy at competitive costs."

Faiman told Armstrong: "A thousand megawatts is 10 per cent of Israel's present generating capacity… It's enough for something like a million people."

Summing up, Armstrong observed: "All of this has dramatically changed the landscape of solar energy, once a bit player, now a realistic, viable, pollution-free alternative to conventional energy sources."

The fact that CBC devoted so much attention to this story indicates the importance placed on Israel's technology sector, which can be of great benefit to a world deeply concerned about the environment, especially, clean sources of energy.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Oshawa teacher introduces diversity to her students through Hana's Suitcase

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

A 13-year-old girl who was murdered more than 60 years ago in Auschwitz is still inspiring people all over the world to learn about diversity, tolerance and community.

Shawntelle Nesbitt, a teacher who taught at Adelaide McLaughlin Public School in Oshawa last year, headed a year-long study project based on the book Hana's Suitcase.

The book tells the story of Fumiko Ishioka, a Japanese teacher and director of the Tokyo Holocaust Education Resource Center, who, among other artifacts for the centre, once received a suitcase belonging to Hana Brady.

Ishioka, along with her students, decided to investigate the life of the young Jewish girl and her tragic fate. The book, written by Karen Levine, chronicles their investigation and their discovery of Hana's brother, George Brady, who lives in Toronto.

Despite the fact that Nesbitt is not Jewish, and none of her Grade 6 students were either, she felt that this book would be the perfect foundation to create a project that would teach her students about the importance of tolerance and diversity.

Nesbitt said she first introduced her students to the concept by reading the book aloud to the class. She then asked them to create their own suitcases, modeled after Hana's, that would include items showcasing elements of their family history and identity.

"Just like Hana's suitcase told the story of her life, their suitcases told the story of theirs. It involved their grandparents [and] great-grandparents. It was over the course of the year and we integrated it into all my subjects," Nesbitt said.

Aside from creating a suitcase, students also learned about diversity by writing paragraphs, letters, journals, and reports about people living in countries including Sri Lanka, Hong Kong and Ukraine.

Students also created family trees, flags, Ukrainian Easter eggs, and time capsules.

She said that some of the artifacts and documents that the students brought in were from as far back as the 1800s.

"They brought in displacement papers, immigration papers, some kids had photographs of the actual ships their grandparents came in on… And at the end of the year was the big Grade 6 Gallery Opening and we had all of our suitcases displayed, all of our work throughout the year, and about 200 people [from the community] showed up," she said.

Shawntelle Nesbitt

But no matter what country, culture or community Nesbitt's class was studying, Hana was the centre of it all.

"Hana was someone who we talked about throughout the year and I always brought it back to Hana. If there was bullying in the schoolyard, [we applied it]… it became part of our classroom culture."

She said that she got the idea for this project when she was teaching at another school in Peterborough and she sat on the school's multicultural committee.

"We came up with the idea of the suitcase… but I hopefully took it up a notch where we really investigated our heritages and I integrated it into all our subjects and it wasn't just an add-on to the curriculum. I really tried to make it part of the foundation."

But Nesbitt was careful to ensure that the content wouldn't be too graphic for 11-year-olds.

"I know that a teacher of mine did that to us – they presented us with this graphic information and it just shut us down. It just shuts [kids] down and they can't connect to it. They can't see themselves. With Hana, Hana was their age, so they could connect with that, and getting to know their families while they were getting to know Hana was the connection that they needed, that the Holocaust wasn't just an event in the past," Nesbitt said.

"It was something that meant something to them. Bullying in the schoolyard – how is that different? It's not. I hope it gave them a sense of power in the way that 'I can change the world, and the Holocaust matters and it is connected to me and I can do things to change.'"

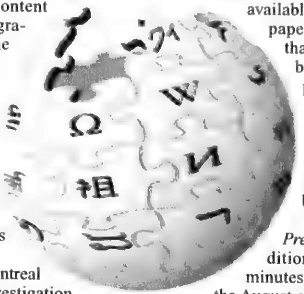
Defamatory Wikipedia entry not posted by its staff, city says

MONTREAL — Montreal city hall says none of its employees is responsible for a Wikipedia posting last year that the executive committee chair Frank Zampino may be a member of an apparently fictitious anti-Semitic group and a onetime Nazi supporter.

An internal investigation found that the defamatory content added to Zampino's biography in the popular online encyclopedia Wikipedia was not entered from a computer at city hall, as had been reported. The city says one of its computers was used by an employee in the executive offices to remove the offending passage on two occasions in July and August 2006.



The city has asked Montreal police to continue the investigation to find who is responsible. There have been suggestions that a hacker may have been able to make it look as if the vandalism was carried out from city hall.

The tampering with Zampino's entry came to light this month through a new online tool that allows modifications made to the Wikipedia to be traced to the computer used to do so based on a machine's unique IP address.

Anyone can anonymously make changes to Wikipedia entries.

On two days in July and August 2006 someone added to Zampino's entry in Wikipedia that he is an "alleged member of the International Kill-All-Jews Federation, division Montreal, member of Weight Watchers and a former Nazi supporter."

Using WikiScanner, which became available this month, the newspaper La Presse discovered that Zampino's entry had been tampered with apparently from a computer linked to the Internet connection on the third floor of city hall, in a conference room near Mayor Gerald Tremblay's office.

According to La Presse, the defamatory addition was removed two minutes after it was entered on the August occasion and then, from the same computer address, other non-contentious modifications were made to Zampino's entry.

In a statement, Zampino called the tampering a "smear campaign" and demanded that police get to the bottom of this incident. He also expressed regret for any offence caused to the Jewish community.

At the city's request, the managers of Wikipedia agreed to remove the defamatory material from its archives.

Project has a lasting effect on the students

Despite the fact that George Brady, Hana's brother, rarely speaks in public about his story, he was impressed enough with the project to travel to the school last May to speak to the students.

"He told us his story. He talked about before the war, during the war, after the war, and you could have heard a pin drop. It was amazing and it affected the kids so much," she said.

Nesbitt added that the project as a whole had a lasting effect on her students.

"They were so surprised with the diversity in their own families. They were just blown away, and that understanding extended to others. They saw diversity within themselves, diversity within their family and all over the place, and that was the shocking thing."

The students weren't the only ones who benefited from the project.

"It's changed my life. I want to get more into anti-racist, multicultural education. It changed me in a way that everything I said about the kids happened to me as well. It was powerful to see the effect of the contribution that I made."

Since heading the project at Adelaide McLaughlin in the 2005-06 school year, Nesbitt took the year off from teaching full-time and has been writing about and promoting the project in the hope that other teachers will introduce the same project in their classrooms.

Nesbitt has even put together a 20-minute video that showcases all the work her students did throughout the year.

"I think the whole point of multicultural education is not necessarily about studying exotic countries. I think kids working together, learning how to resolve conflict, appreciating each other and appreciating their community is more multicultural education, and that was where I thought it needed to be infused in the curriculum."

Canadian federations gather aid for Peru

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Following the launch of an emergency relief fund by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to help victims of the recent earthquake in Peru, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg has set up its own website to aid those affected.

Proceeds from the relief campaigns will be distributed via the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), which will work in harmony with various other disaster relief agencies already on the ground.

United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC) said all its local affiliates are either using individual sites or the Toronto-based website to spread the word to Jewish communities across the country.

However, all funds are being funnelled through UIAFC to the JDC relief effort.

Gayle Tallman, executive director of the Jewish Federation of Edmonton, said her organization is referring her community to the Toronto federation's website.

Peru's Jewish community of approximately 3,000 people, most of whom live in Lima, has also contributed with supplies.

The 8.0 magnitude earthquake hit about 200 kilometres south of Lima on Aug. 15, killed 500 people, injured more than 1,500 others, and left tens of thousands homeless.

UIAFC and the Winnipeg federation could not determine last week how much money had been raised in total by Canada's Jewish communities to date, as it was still early on in the relief campaign.

But UJA Federation in Toronto said it had raised $10,000 as of Aug. 24.

To contribute, visit www.jewishwinnipeg.org or www.jewishtoronto.net and click on the "Peru Earthquake Relief Fund" emblem.

STUDENTS LEAVE FOR HIGH SCHOOL IN ISRAEL: From left, students Natalie Halyo, Yael Fridlander, Jenna Greenbloom and Halyo's sister Shiran pose with Liane Sela, regional director of Toronto's Israel Aliyah Centre, at a celebratory send-off. The girls are among seven Canadians who will leave for Israel on Sunday to study at the Elite Academy. The program, sponsored by the government of Israel and the Jewish Agency, offers three years of high school in Israel for free. About 80 North American students will begin the program this year.

Israeli school's status upgrade meets with opposition

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Despite public opposition by Israel's Minister of Education, the College of Judea and Samaria in Ariel declared itself a "university center" earlier this month in what may be the first step on the way to full-fledged university status.

The school, renamed the Ariel University Center of Samaria, has since been clouded in controversy, because Israel's Council for Higher Education (CHE) opposes the name change and provisional designation for the West Bank school, as does Education Minister Yuli Tamir, who said the declaration is meaningless, illegal and politically motivated.

But Ariel Ellisman, the executive director of the American Friends of the College of Judea and Samaria, said that school administrators "looked at all the rules and played the game as… it needed to be played and did it thoroughly and completely…

"Our feeling is that it is almost woeful that the person who is in charge of education in Israel made it something political when it should be a matter of education," he added.

Established in 1982, the school, located in the settlement of Ariel, is the largest public college and one of the fastest-growing academic institutions in Israel, with a student body of more than 9,000.

Despite this, the CHE said the research being done there is not up to university standards, and it vowed that its planning and budgeting committee would not grant the school the funding that other universities get.

The controversy began in 2005 when Limor Livnat, then the education minister, pushed through a cabinet resolution that supported upgrading the college to university status, which would allow it to issue post-graduate degrees and apply for more government funding for research.

Many opposed this move because of the political implications – the school is located well beyond the Green Line and the CHE had also decided that it didn't want to create another university in Israel for at least five years.

In July 2006, the CHE rejected the college's request for a status change, but the school found a loophole and applied to the Council for Higher Education in Judea and Samaria (CHE-JS), an independent organization that supervises higher education in the West Bank.

The CHE-JS appointed an evaluation committee made up of celebrated academics to decide whether the college would meet the requirements expected of a university.

"The panel said… in order to justify an approval for university status, we had to establish three more graduate programs. They have to be fully accredited, they have to go through the process. In June, we had approval of our MBA program, so that met the criteria of the graduate programs. When we came in with the MBA program, we had all the elements there," Ellisman said, adding that after the committee reviewed the school's progress, it approved the status change in July.

Ynetnews reported that the school's executive committee chairman, Yigal Cohen-Orgad, said there was nothing illegal about the process.

"This process has passed an inspection by a committee [comprising] four Israel Prize laureates, three of whom are members of the Academy of Science, who inspected the college's data for over a year before making their recommendations," he said.

But Ellisman explained that the school is not a full-fledged university yet. "Now we are authorized to assume the status of what we would call a 'university center,'" he said, adding that the CHE-JS will decide in five years whether to recognize it as a full-fledged university, based on how well it performs and meets certain criteria.

"We were depending upon [the committee], and the world was basically depending on them to make an objective review based purely on academics. The college has tried to sidestep, if you would, the politics of this location and in many ways, rise above that discussion by providing high standard education," Ellisman said.

School doesn't have to be all about homework

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The realization that summer is coming to an end is depressing enough, but coupled with the knowledge that another year of essays, exams, three-hour lectures and all-night cram sessions is just around the corner can make the last week of summer vacation a bittersweet experience.

But school doesn't have to be all work and no play.

For those seasoned university veterans who are going back for yet another year, and for the freshmen who are preparing to venture into a new world, here is a list of Jewish student groups, both social and political, that can be found at universities in the Greater Toronto Area.

Hillel, whether at York University, the University of Toronto or Ryerson University, is a group that aims to provide students with Jewish-themed activities, both social and educational. No membership is required, and involvement is encouraged for all Jews, regardless of denomination. Hillels in the GTA can be accessed through links at www.hilleltoronto.org.

Kulanu Toronto (www.kulanutoronto.ca), the Jewish Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgendered Queer (LGBTQ) social group, is designed for, but not exclusive to, the student community and is funded by Hillel Toronto. Founded in 2003, the organization offers events for the LGBTQ community with a Jewish theme. All of their events are kosher and include Shabbat dinners, barbecues, karaoke nights, movie nights, and pub nights.

If singing is your passion, join the Varsity Jews, U of T's Jewish a cappella choir, which is also affiliated with Hillel. The Varsity Jews (www.varsityjews.com) sing anything from traditional Hebrew folk to classic rock "with an added Jewish flavour." By selling tickets to their performances, they have raises thousands of dollars for Jewish and Israeli causes. There is also a Jewish a cappella group at York called Kol Neshama.

A year-old group at York called the Campus Coalition of Zionists, headed by Jonathan Roth (cczatyork@gmail.com) takes a political stance in support of Israel and against anti-Israel groups.

Betar Tagar (www.betar.ca) at U of T is a Zionist student organization that is based on the ideals and philosophy of Ze'ev Jabotinsky, a pioneer of the Zionist movement, and is dedicated to promoting Israel's right to exist in peace and security.

Shalom – Salam (www.yorku.ca/ssy) is a group that was formed "to create, facilitate and promote an atmosphere of mutual respect and tolerance as well as peaceful co-existence between pro-Israeli and pro-Palestinian students within the York community."

The Canadian Jewish Law Students' Association (www.cjlsa.ca), founded in 1987 "acts as the national voice for Jewish law students." Each year, it organizes a national conference that emphasizes professional development and offers students the opportunity to network.

For a more spiritual approach to Judaism, the Kabbalah Club reaches out to people of all backgrounds and faiths to meet, study, discuss and socialize. For more information, e-mail Jacob Kessler at jkessler@rogers.com.

Interested in honing your writing skills? Notebook, (http://notebook.sa.utoronto.ca) a journal for students, by students, tackles contemporary Jewish issues with "well-researched, and intellectually provocative" pieces that aim to encourage healthy dialogue on campus.

While universities may be reluctant to recognize these groups on campus, there is no denying the presence of fraternities and sororities. The Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi, better known as AEPi, (www.aepi.org) isn't all about womanizing and beer-guzzling. The brothers are dedicated to building a sense of community and raising money for good causes.

Delta Pi, (www.deltapisorority.ca) the female equivalent to AEPi, based at York University, is also dedicated to raising money for causes such as breast cancer.

School not a full-fledged university

"Our standing as an educational institution should not be questioned. Whether or not we are to be advanced to a university, that should be in the hands of academics who can make those kinds of decisions."

Although Tamir and the CHE are vehemently opposed to the school's change in status, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert welcomed the announcement with a letter to school president Dan Meyerstein.

In it, he congratulated Meyerstein and said that the upgrade would benefit Israel's economy and society.

"In some people's eyes, our existence in Ariel is considered to be politically controversial. My personal view and that of many others is that if Jews are going to be in Judea and Samaria, then the real question is, what are we doing there and are we worthy of the position. I can't think of anything more worthy than creating a world-class university… I think it's sad that the top representative of Israeli education is seemingly playing a political card, and my hope is that the dust will settle and the real questions will remain – are they worthy?"

This wakes up the body.
This wakes up the soul.

Holiday Food Ideas

Preparing for Rosh Hashanah

Editorial

In Jewish homes, food is very much linked to tradition, especially around the High Holy Days.

As our grandparents and great-grandparents did before us, we serve apples and honey, slightly sweet round challahs dotted with raisins to make them extra sweet, and carrot rounds to symbolize our hope that we will increase our good deeds in the coming year.

On the second day of Rosh Hashanah, we eat a fruit that we haven't yet eaten this season. Many of us choose pomegranates because it is said that each one contains 613 seeds, equal to the number of mitzvot, and because we hope that the number of good deeds in the upcoming year will be as plentiful as these seeds.

In some homes, a fish head, an ancient symbol of fertility and abundance is placed on the Rosh Hashanah table to symbolize the head of the new year. In other homes, rice is served to symbolize abundance, or spinach to symbolize a green year with plenty of produce.

The one custom that links us all, however, is the gathering of family and friends around the Rosh Hashanah table, and the presentation of food that encompasses the various customs.

Jewish cooks everywhere plan their dinners by digging up old family favourites, swapping recipes with friends, or poring over cookbooks for some new and creative ideas.

Most seek to incorporate the ancient symbols into their meals, and choose such dishes as carrot tzimmes, honey-baked chicken or apple cake.

We have tried to help you in your search for recipes by providing some favourites from longtime CJN contributors and from new friends who are happy to share.

From all of us at The CJN, we wish you happy cooking and, most of all, a shanah tovah.

Sweet beginnings for a new year

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

One can never have too many dessert recipes, in my opinion, and certainly at this time of year, that idiom applies to apple desserts as well. Apples pair so wonderfully with so many different flavours such as toffee, cheese, cranberries and of course, cinnamon. These four flavours are highlighted in the recipes below. Try to use apples such as golden delicious or spy, which hold their shape when baked.

TOFFEE APPLE CAKE

A homey cake with huge kid appeal, this cake is super easy to make and just perfect for an after synagogue luncheon.

1/4 cup unsalted butter, softened
1/2 cup packed light brown sugar
1egg
1/2 tsp. vanilla
1 cup all-purpose flour
1/2 tsp. each baking powder and baking soda pinch salt
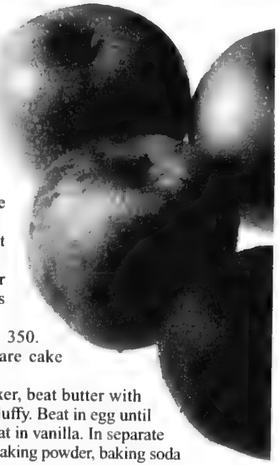
1/2 cup sour cream
1 cup diced peeled apples
1/3 cup Skor toffee bits



Topping
1/4 cup all-purpose flour
1 tbsp. packed light brown sugar
2 tbsp. unsalted butter
1/2 cup Skor toffee bits

Preheat oven to 350. Grease an 8-in. square cake pan.

Using electric mixer, beat butter with sugar until light and fluffy. Beat in egg until well incorporated. Beat in vanilla. In separate bowl, combine flour, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Using wooden spoon, stir flour mixture into butter mixture alternately with sour cream, making three additions of dry ingredients and two of sour cream. Gently fold in apples and toffee bits. Spread batter into prepared baking pan.

For topping, mix together flour, sugar, butter and toffee bits until very crumbly; sprinkle evenly over batter.

Bake in centre of preheated oven for 35 to 40 minutes or until toothpick inserted in centre comes out clean. Makes 12 servings.

Plan a grand finale for your holiday meal

DOUBLE APPLE BUNDT CAKE

The apple butter, which is simply cooked down apples with sugar, lends this delicious cake extra moistness. Feel free to substitute walnuts or pecans for the raisins.

⅓ cup unsalted butter or margarine, softened
1⅓ cups packed brown sugar
2 eggs
1 cup apple butter
2 large tart apples, peeled, cored and grated
2 cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. cinnamon
¼ tsp.salt
½ cup raisins or chopped walnuts

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 10-in. (12-cup) Bundt pan.

Using electric mixer, beat butter with sugar until light coloured, scraping down mixture often. Add the eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Gradually beat in the apple butter. The mixture will look curdled.

In separate bowl, combine flour, baking powder, baking soda, cinnamon and salt; gradually stir into butter mixture alternately with grated apples, making three additions of dry ingredients and two of apples. Fold in raisins. Scrape batter into prepared pan, smoothing top.

Bake in preheated oven for 40 to 45 minutes or until cake tester inserted in centre comes out clean. Cool in pan on rack for 10 minutes. Unmould cake and let cool completely. Dust with icing sugar or drizzle with caramel sauce before serving. Makes 16 servings.

HONEY CARAMELIZED APPLE CHEESECAKE

This is indeed a honey of a cake, meant as a grand finale. Even if you're stuffed to the gills, you'll find yourself finishing off a slice of this sublime dessert. Make this the day ahead as it needs to be refrigerated overnight to set.

Crust
1½ cups graham cracker crumbs
3 tbsp. granulated sugar
½ tsp. cinnamon
¼ cup unsalted butter, melted

Apple Layer
3 large tart apples, peeled, cored and cut into eighths
2 tbsp. butter
2 tbsp. each granulated sugar and honey

Cream Cheese Filling
1½ lbs. cream cheese, softened
1 cup granulated sugar
2 tsp. vanilla
3 eggs
¾ cup sour cream

Preheat oven to 325. In bowl, mix together graham cracker crumbs, sugar, cinnamon and butter until crumbs are thoroughly moistened. Pat into bottom and partly up the sides of 9-inch springform pan. Centre pan on a large piece of aluminum foil; press foil tightly to sides of springform. Bake in centre of preheated oven for 10 minutes. Remove; let cool slightly.

Meanwhile, prepare apples. Melt butter in large skillet set over medium-high heat. When butter is bubbling, add apples and cook, stirring, for 2 minutes. Add sugar and honey. Cook, stirring often, for 10 minutes or until apples are nicely browned. Let cool for 5 minutes.

Arrange apples slices in concentric circles on top of graham base, using electric beaters, beat cream cheese for 2 minutes, until fluffy. Gradually beat in sugar, scraping down sides often. Add eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition and scraping down sides frequently. Beat in vanilla. Stir in sour cream. Pour mixture over apples. Set springform in larger roasting pan; pour in enough hot water to come 1-in. up sides. Bake in centre of preheated oven for 45 to 55 minutes or until shine disappears and edge is set but centre still jiggles slightly.

Turn off oven. Let cake cool in oven for 1 hour. Remove from water bath onto rack and remove foil; let cool completely. Remove sides of springform. Cover and refrigerate overnight or for up to 2 days. Just before serving, garnish with a drizzle of honey. Makes 16 servings.

APPLE-BERRY CRISP

Topping
1 cup all purpose flour
¾ cup packed light brown sugar
¾ cup old fashioned oats
1 tsp. cinnamon
pinch ground ginger
½ cup butter or margarine, melted

Filling
5 apples, peeled, cored and sliced
1½ cup raspberries, blueberries or strawberries
½ cup dried cranberries
½ cup granulated sugar
1 tbsp. all purpose flour

Preheat oven to 375. Lightly grease 8-in. square baking dish or 8 1-cup capacity bowls or cups.

In large bowl, combine flour, sugar, oats, cinnamon and ginger. Pour butter over, mixing until very crumbly.

For filling, toss apples, berries of choice, cranberries, sugar and flour together. Transfer to prepared baking dish(es). Sprinkle topping evenly over the fruit mixture.

Bake in centre of preheated oven for 40 to 45 minutes or until the topping is golden and fruit juices are bubbling. Let rest for at least 15 minutes before serving. Makes 8 servings.

Homemade bread-baking on the rise

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Homemade bread-baking seems to be on the rise judging from the number of new cookbooks available on the subject. But to Jewish women, challah-making has always been special. It's one of the three special mitzvot given exclusively to women.

A Taste of Challah: A Comprehensive Guide to Challah and Bread Baking (Feldheim Publishers) by Tamar Ansh is one of the most comprehensive books, complete with clear and detailed instructions and more than 350 beautiful full-colour, step-by-step photographs.

It's more than just another bread-making recipe book. I am an experienced bread-maker and have taught classes in bread-making for many years. Nevertheless, I learned so much from this book.

Sitting in Tamar's kitchen, listening to this bubbly, petite woman enthuse about challah baking was a pleasure. Tamar decided that there weren't any cookbooks that offered detailed photographs and instructions for making challah and set about to de-mystify what she calls the art of challah- and bread-making. Every recipe in the book was homemade by Tamar and photographed to prove that the recipes really do work. The different ways of shaping the challahs will amaze you.

In addition to recipes and instructions for everything you ever wanted to know about making and braiding challah, there are wonderful chapters on large challah shapes, small challah shapes, health challah and breads, specialty breads, Middle Eastern breads and accompaniments, and fun and different ideas. Recipes include, in addition to the traditional challahs, Zatar challah, Pecan challah, Yemenite Saluf, flower-shaped challah rolls, kubana, onion croissants and dessert breads and rolls.

Most of the challah recipes begin with Always Perfect No-egg Challah, and then expand on the basic recipe. Many of them, however, are given in amounts to make six or more large, 8-10 medium or 30-35 small challahs with no instructions given for smaller quantities. This won't present a challenge as the recipes can easily be halved.

Whether you're a novice to challah- and bread-baking or an old hand at it, this is a book you'll definitely want to own. It would also make a wonderful gift for your favourite bride. As the book indicates, it was "published to encourage young women, older women, freshly Jewish, oldly Jewish, newly marrieds, oldly marrieds and soon-to-be-marrieds everywhere." I would also add, you don't even have to be Jewish.

ALWAYS PERFECT NO-EGG CHALLAH

Basic white flour challah dough
16 to 17 cups freshly sifted white flour
$4\frac{3}{4}$ to 5 cups warm water
$1\frac{1}{3}$ to $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups sugar
75 g fresh yeast (if fresh is not available, you can substitute 3 tbsp. of dry yeast)
1 cup canola oil
1 tbsp. salt

Sift the flour. This can be done the night before and placed in a large garbage bag to save time, although you can certainly sift the flour the same day you plan to make the dough. Close the bag tightly until ready for use.

HEALTHY NEVER TASTED SO GOOD

Everything you want to know about challah… and more

Boil a few cups of the water. In one small pareve bowl or measuring cup, put ½ cup boiled water and 1 cup tap water together. Test with your finger to make sure it is very warm but not boiling. Boiling water kills the yeast activity.

Add ¼ cup of the sugar to this water and then the fresh yeast. Cover this small bowl with a plate and set it aside for 10 minutes to make sure the yeast starts bubbling. This means the yeast is activating. If the yeast doesn't bubble up, it means the yeast is not good; discard, and start again.

In a large mixer bowl (if you don't have a mixer, you can do this by hand), place, in this order: oil, the rest of the sugar, 2 cups warm water, salt and 8 cups flour. Mix it all very well until a thin sort of batter forms. After the yeast mixture has bubbled, add this also and mix again.

Now start adding the remaining flour slowly, one or two cups at a time, until it is all mixed in.

By this point all of the ingredients except for the remaining water should be mixed in. The total amount of water used so far is about 4 cups.

Keep adding a quarter cup of water at a time to the mixing dough until a pliable, smooth and non-sticky consistency is reached.

If the dough is too firm, you need to add a bit more water, and also 2 more tablespoons of oil. If the dough is too soft or wet, add a bit more flour, even if you have to go over the 17 cup limit somewhat. In general, there will be about 5 cups of water total. Climates, different flours and different yeasts all make a vast difference in this stage.

Grease your hands or a large plastic spatula with a fine layer of oil. Scrape down sides of bowl and mix the very bottom of the bowl to ensure that all the flour is well mixed into your dough and that it is uniform in texture all around. You may need to add a bit more oil to the bottom of the bowl before remixing in order to keep the dough from becoming too sticky.

In general, in order to keep your dough pliable, non-sticky and smooth, use small amounts of oil on the outside of the dough, not extra flour. Too much flour dries out the dough in the long run, whereas the fine layer of oil keeps it from sticking and makes it easier to work with, helps it rise better, and enhances its overall taste.

Cover bowl with dough inside – but do not remove from mixer yet – and let rise in bowl for 10 minutes. Uncover and knead, with a drop more oil, for another 5 minutes.

For added smoothness, you can cover the dough one more time for 10 minutes, and then knead by hand the final time for another 5-10 minutes until smooth and workable. Just look at how much nicer that same messy, ugly dough appears now!

Grease your hands lightly and remove dough from mixing bowl. If you are not shaping challahs until later in the day, or if you chose to make the dough at night in order to shape and bake it the next morning, place dough in a very large garbage bag and take out all the air from the bag. Tie at the end, giving dough plenty of space to rise and place in fridge. Remove from fridge 30-45 minutes before you are ready to shape.

If you are shaping right away, leave the dough in the garbage bag or covered well with plastic on the counter for 1 hour before shaping. It will rise at least double its size.

Cut off slices of dough and, with the aid of your rolling pin, roll each one out to a medium thin oval. Roll into a log and set aside for 5 minutes. Braid challahs and allow them to rise for 45 minutes on a baking tray covered with parchment paper. Cover loosely with plastic while rising.

Preheat oven to 375 for 20 minutes prior to baking. Make an egg mixture of 3 whole eggs plus 2 egg yolk and 1 tsp. oil. Mix together and gently brush over challahs.

For large challahs bake 20-25 minutes until they start to turn brown. Lower the heat to 350 and continue baking until done (when they are browned completely on the bottom also). Makes 6 large challahs, 8 to 10 medium challahs, 30 to 35 small challah rolls.

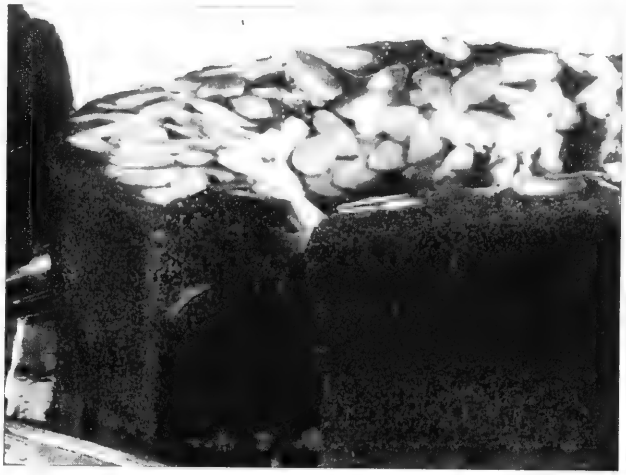
Baking traditions too good to keep in family



By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Some families have special recipes that get handed down from one generation to the next.

For instance, Gilda Berger's cinnamon coffee cake has been baked by four generations of her family. She brought the cake to Camp Gesher on visitors' day, and it was such a hit that she kindly agreed to share the recipe, with CJN readers.

"I am delighted that my Baba Rhoda's sour cream coffee cake was so appreciated," Berger says. "It is a treasured legacy she left us.

"My daughter Talia has made this cake from my recipe collection. So the tradition continues from my paternal baba, to my mother, to me and my sister, and now to my daughter."

In the Simms family, the tradition of passing on recipes is skipping a generation, says Frances Simms, mother of three, grandmother of seven and great-grand mother of two. She says she never had time to teach her daughters the recipes she learned from her own mother and friends in the Hamilton Jewish community.

"My daughters were too busy with school and music lessons, but they tell me that when they used to turn into our driveway they could always smell my baking."

She says that while her two daughters never had the time or inclination to bake, her teenage granddaughters, Kayla and Tamar, are eager to learn. "They've been coming up to the apartment to bake with me on Sundays during the school year."

Although her daughters are not bakers, Simms says they have decided they do want to know how to make her "amazing" gefilte fish recipe. "This year, they're coming over to learn. They say it's so good I should keep the recipe a family secret."

Like Simms, Freda Schwartz, mother of four daughters and grandmother of six, says so far, it's her 19-year-old granddaughter, Nina Kagan, who's most interested in learning her baking secrets. Very popular with the family at Rosh Hashanah is a honey cake Schwartz learned to make when she lived in Winnipeg. She describes it as lighter tasting and less dense than the more traditional honey cakes.

She says she has not yet had the chance to show her granddaughter how to make the honey cake recipe below. However, she has taught her to make her cheesecake, which she makes for family birthdays and anniversaries.

"Nina called me. She said she made the cheesecake for her friends. She said, 'Bubbie they really liked it. It tasted just like yours,'" Schwartz says.

BABA RHODA'S CINNAMON SOUR CREAM COFFEE CAKE

Batter
½ cup butter
1 cup white sugar
2 eggs
1 tsp. baking soda
½ tsp. baking powder
1½ cups flour
1 cup sour cream

Filling
¼ cup brown sugar
2 tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Cream butter, eggs and sugar. Add alternately soda, baking powder, flour and sour cream. Blend until smooth. Grease and lightly sprinkle with flour a ring-shaped cake pan.

Spoon half the batter around the cake pan. Sprinkle ¾ of the cinnamon-brown sugar filling over the batter all around. Spoon the remaining batter on top and then sprinkle the sugar-cinnamon on top. Alternatively, all the cinnamon-sugar filling can be put in the middle, instead of using some for the top. Bake for 45 minutes. Test with a toothpick, which should come out dry.

FRANCES SIMMS' MERINGUE COOKIES

2 egg whites
⅛ tsp. salt
⅛ tsp. cream of tartar
1 tsp. vanilla
scant ½ cup sugar
12 oz. package of chocolate chips
¼ cup chopped walnuts

Preheat oven to 300. Line two baking sheets each with a single layer of paper towelling. If possible, use a metal bowl for beating the egg whites. Beat them in mixer until they're foamy. Add cream of tartar and salt. Beat until soft peaks form. Beat on high. Add vanilla. Gradually add sugar. Beat until egg whites are stiff. Fold in chocolate chips and nuts.

Simms uses a tablespoon and pushes the batter off the spoon with her finger onto the baking sheet, placing the cookies half an inch apart. Bake the meringues for 25 minutes or until they turn a tan colour. Turn off oven and let them sit in oven for 2 hours to dry out. Leave the oven door ajar to prevent burning. Peel the meringues off the paper toweling. Freeze in an air-tight bag. Defrost meringues 15 minutes before serving.

FREDA SCHWARTZ'S HONEY CAKE

6 eggs
½ cup sugar
1 cup dark honey
1 cup oil
2 tsp. baking powder
1 tsp. baking soda
¼ cup of tea, cooled
3 cups flour

Preheat oven to 325. Spray a large 12-in. springform pan with cooking spray. Place honey in saucepan and cook on low heat. Add baking soda.

Remove from stove and let honey mixture cool. In a separate bowl, mix baking powder with flour and set aside.

Using an electric mixer, beat eggs on low to medium speed. Add sugar and then oil. Add cooled honey. Beating on low speed, add flour gradually, alternating with the tea. Pour batter into greased pan. Bake 1½ hours. Cool cake before transferring it to a platter.

Falling in love in the Holy Land

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When most people go on a birthright israel trip, they come back having fallen in love with Israel.

In Jenny Vanderay's case, the country was just one aspect of the trip she'd fallen in love with.

Vanderay, 26, originally from Victoria, B.C., went on a Canada Israel Experience birthright israel trip in 2003, where she met her new husband, a soldier assigned to her trip named Beni Meir.

When she first met Meir, who was one of 25 soldiers from his Israeli air force unit that was assigned to join her trip for four days, Vanderay felt like she had found the person she was supposed to be with.

"We really started talking when we were hiking down from Masada, maybe the second day that he was there. I had an overwhelming sense of contentment. There wasn't a language barrier for us. His English was quite good and I just felt like home. It was my first time in Israel and I felt like I found my heart.

"I felt like I was with my other half, like even at that time, I knew that we would be together," Vanderay recalled, adding even though his unit was only assigned to her trip for four days, Meir would make special trips to see her and participate in the hikes and other activities.

As of August 16, Vanderay and Meir are husband and wife. They were married near Akko.

While Vanderay speaks of Meir as her soul mate, she wanted to make sure that her decision to leave her life and family behind in Canada would be made for the right reasons.

She said that after the birthright trip, she knew she wanted to make aliyah to Israel.

"People ask me, 'Did you immigrate for Beni? 'And I always say 'No, but I can't separate the two.' That's how I felt. That both Israel and he was my home. It happened all at once. Being in Israel and meeting him, I had that reinforcement and I think it reinforced me wanting to be here to start a generation in Israel. All of those emotions were mixed up in our meeting."

She said that what helped her feel connected to Israel, independent of her meeting with Meir, was the interaction she had with Israelis her age.

"For birthrighters in general, even though you're in Israel, you're still in your Canadian environment or box and one thing that really broke that for me and a lot of people on our trip was getting to know Israelis our own age. It's one thing to go around and see all the history and culture and that's enough for some people, but for other people it's having that connection with someone our own age and to see what they're going through," Vanderay said.

Despite the instant connection she felt with Meir, she said she didn't have any expectations of a relationship, but she knew that she wanted to return to the Holy Land.

"I wanted to work with orphans and I knew that I wanted to come to Israel for that," she said.

"I had no expectations when I met him, and even today, we never really talk about the status of our relationship because it was so strong that it was just kind of understood. That was only after five days, so I think that's quite rare. When I went back to Canada we were talking on MSN, email, the telephone and then I came back six months later. That is when I started to have expectations because by then we had established a relationship."

She said that because she wanted to work with orphans, she joined the ulpan kibbutz Ma'agan Michael in Israel for six months in 2004 so she could learn Hebrew.

"When that was over, I wasn't ready to leave him. I felt like I had been on a kibbutz for six months and I wanted to see more of Israel. I ended up volunteering with Magen David Adom and I did that for another six months in Haifa. During that time, Beni changed units. He went from an air force unit to a ground force unit. In that year, a lot of things happened with him and we grew closer and closer." Afraid that her ability to decide whether she really wanted to make aliyah would be clouded by her feelings for Meir, Vanderay travelled back to Canada to gain perspective.

"I knew that I had to go back to Canada because I thought that I didn't just want to immigrate strictly for him. I think that because my feelings were so strong for him, I was afraid to make a mistake. It wasn't until I went back to Canada that I knew that Israel was my home. Everything put together, him, Israel, my future. When I'm here there is nowhere else in the world I would rather be."

Vanderay remained in Canada for a full year in 2005, before she immigrated to Israel in 2006 with Nefesh b'Nefesh, an organization that charters flights and offers assistance to North Americans making aliyah.

Just last April, Meir proposed in a style fitting their relationship.

"Like I said, we don't always talk about the status of our relationship so we were talking about having kids and getting married and so he said to me, 'Are you sure that you want to marry me?' and I said, 'Well, that's one way to propose,' and that was really it.

"The next weekend, we decided that we were going to tell his family. So it wasn't on Masada with a ring or anything, but I think that really describes our relationship because it is very natural and it just flows and it has its own rhythm to it."

Now that the happy newlyweds are together in Israel, they are building a future together.

Vanderay said her Hebrew is improving and after working at the King David Hotel for a year, she has plans to go back to school to study dentistry.

Meir, is still serving in the army as an officer in the Givati brigade, an Israel Defence Force infantry brigade.

Hamas in Syria plans suicide bombings: Shin Bet

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Security services are increasingly concerned that the Hamas leadership in Syria is intensifying efforts to undermine the diplomatic dialogue between Israel and the Palestinian Authority through a series of spectacular terrorist attacks.

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas were scheduled to meet in Jerusalem Monday as part of their push toward an "agreement of principles" ahead of the regional summit organized under U.S. auspices for November.

At an intelligence briefing during the cabinet meeting yesterday, the deputy head of the Shin Bet said the Hamas leadership in Damascus has instructed West Bank-based militants to attempt a large-scale attack inside Israel.

"There are efforts by Khaled Meshal [Hamas' political bureau chief based in Damascus] and the Hamas leadership abroad to formulate a plan to undermine the diplomatic efforts between PA Chairman Mahmoud Abbas and Israel," Y., the deputy head of the Shin Bet, told the ministers.

However, Hamas officials offered differing opinions yesterday on the question of renewing terrorist attacks in the West Bank and Israel.

A political adviser to Hamas leader Ismail Haniyyeh, Ahmad Yousef, told Ha'aretz that the Shin Bet's assessments are inaccurate.

"There is no change in the Hamas position. Israel is threatening us and attacking us – we are only responding to provocations. But we do not intend to initiate any action, like the resumption of suicide bombings," Yousef said.

However, Fawzi Barhum, spokesperson for Hamas in Gaza, told Ha'aretz that the organization intends to use any means to achieve its aims. He refused to confirm or deny the charges by the Shin Bet deputy head.

The Shin Bet officer said that Hamas is frustrated by developments in the Gaza Strip and the losses the group has suffered in operations recently by the Israel Defence Forces.

Hamas is also dissatisfied with the results of its attempts to gain international legitimacy, especially among countries in the European Union.

The officer also pointed to Fatah's steadfast refusal to resume negotiations with Hamas and the continuing pressure on Islamic militants in the West Bank as other factors creating anxiety among the group's members.

"According to intelligence, Hamas is frustrated by the fact that the Rafah crossing [on the border with Egypt] has remained closed, and there are those within the organization who are considering an escalation of operations against Egypt to force the opening of the crossing," Y. said.

The fact the organization is being blamed by many people in the Gaza Strip for the deteriorating living conditions there and the internal Palestinian crisis is posing a strategic challenge for Hamas.

The Shin Bet official said this increases the likelihood that Hamas will have to change its policy on carrying out attacks, shifting its weight from the Gaza Strip to the West Bank and possibly also abroad.

In spite of Israel's successes at countering Hamas, Islamic Jihad militants in the northern West Bank continue to pose a serious threat.

Referring to the condition of the Gaza population, Y. said that although there is no immediate danger of a humanitarian crisis unfolding there, the private sector has suffered a near fatal blow because of the closure of the enclave.

The renewed suspicions that Hamas' Damascus-based leadership is planning to escalate the conflict is not contributing to an easing of tensions between Israel and Syria.

The IDF forces on the Golan Heights are still on a relatively high level of alert, and the army is holding large-scale training exercises.

A number of positions along the border have recently been reactivated, and the IDF has postponed the replacement of a number of senior officers. Among those whose replacement has been postponed are the deputy chief of staff, Moshe Kaplinsky, and the chief of operations at the General Staff.

Defence sources told Ha'aretz they believe that Syria's intentions are likely to become clear in a few weeks.

Among the issues that Israel is concerned about are the close ties between Syria and Iran, and the growing transfer of advanced weaponry to Syria and Hezbollah.

Possible Durban sequel causes concern

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — Jewish groups are keeping a watchful eye on the first preparatory meetings for what some are calling Durban II, the follow-up to the infamous UN-sponsored conference against racism in 2001.

The World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Intolerance, held in Durban, South Africa, on the eve of the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, was a scandal of global proportions, according to Jewish officials who were present. Representatives of Jewish non-governmental organizations (NGOs) were harassed, sometimes physically, while anti-Semitic propaganda – including copies of Mein Kampf and the Protocols of the Elders of Zion – were freely distributed. The Israeli and American delegations walked out in protest, Governments were to meet in Geneva on Monday to begin preparations for a follow-up conference, due to be held in 2009. Some groups are worried that a repeat of the 2001 debacle is in the works.

"What we saw emerge from there is the script that the Jewish world is struggling with right now," said Rabbi Abraham Cooper, associate dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Center. "Apartheid was consecrated there. Divestment, apartheid, sanctions – in some ways also the first sort of introduction of an approach in which it was no longer a matter of where Israel's borders should be, it was an assault on Israel's right to exist."

Several decisions to be taken this week are considered key determinants of whether the 2009 conference will follow the lead of Durban I – among them, the conference's size and location, the extent to which NGOs will participate, and whether the final document from the Durban conference, known as the plan of action, will be reconsidered.

Some developments are worrying Jewish activists. Libya has been selected as the chair of the planning committee, which also includes Iran and Cuba. The UN Human Rights Council, the body deemed by many in the Jewish world to be even worse for Israel than its discredited predecessor, the Commission on Human Rights, was designated to oversee the preparations. And the United States, which could potentially blunt the worst anti-Israel excesses, will not officially participate in the planning meeting.

Last Thursday, the United Nations released a list of NGOs wishing to participate in the 2009 conference. It includes a number of Palestinian and Arab groups known for their vigorous opposition to Zionism and the Jewish state.

Adding to the anti-Israel atmosphere is a second conference, due to open this week, on Aug. 30, in Brussels, organized by a UN committee on Palestinian rights that pro-Israel activists view as unfailingly hostile to the Jewish state. The United Nations International Conference of Civil Society in Support of Israeli-Palestinian Peace is being held at the European Parliament, adding the imprimateur of the European Union to what some Jewish leaders say is certain to be two days of vilification and condemnation of Israel.

"We're very concerned," said Sybil Kessler, director of UN affairs for B'nai Brith International, of the Durban preparatory conference. "The composition of the bureau is problematic. The legacy of Durban is hanging above us. This session is going to decide potentially whether this is going to be another fiasco or whether this is going to help redirect the UN agenda on racism and move beyond the problematic legacy of Durban."

While Jewish observers widely agree that co-ordination among Jewish groups and outreach to sympathetic allies will be crucial, there is little evidence that such co-ordination is in the making. Groups already differ on how seriously to take the conference that starts this week, with the Anti-Defamation League and the World Jewish Congress electing to lie low and watch while UN Watch, an American Jewish Committee-affiliated watchdog group, and the Wiesenthal Center will have delegates on hand for the Geneva meetings.

Groups also differ on strategy. Some are calling for reaching out to NGOs, which were responsible for some of the fiercest anti-Israel language to emerge from Durban. Hillel Neuer of UN Watch says the Europeans are the key actors, given the absence of the United States. Anne Bayefsky, the director of the Touro Institute on Human Rights and the Holocaust and editor of Eye on the UN, says attention should be directed to Washington – not Geneva.

"Congress holds the purse strings," Bayefsky said. "Congress decides whether or not its foreign operations budget is used for the funding of UN meetings, and which UN meetings. We can't do anything in Geneva."

Shimon Samuels, the Paris-based representative of the Wiesenthal Center, who says he was thrown off an NGO steering committee related to the first Durban conference because he was Jewish, thinks little can be done to stop a recurrence of 2001.

"I don't think we can avert a recurrence," said Samuels, who intends to be in Geneva next week. "I think what we can do is be informed. We can reach out this time, because there are many, many frustrated NGOs who are brought in at their own cost to exotic places with money they don't have to be window dressing. They are cheerleaders. We did not take advantage of them last time."

Israel Briefs

Hezbollah launches game

Hezbollah launched a video game based on its war last summer with Israel. Special Force 2 – launched this month in Arabic-, Persian- and English-language editions – awards points for killing Israeli soldiers. It retails for about $10 (US). "This game presents the culture of the resistance to children: that occupation must be resisted and that land and the nation must be guarded," a Hezbollah media official told Reuters. Hezbollah, an Iranian-backed, Lebanese-based terror group, launched the war in July 2006 with a surprise raid into Israel, killing eight Israeli soldiers and capturing two.

Surfboards given to Gazans

Palestinian youths will be hitting the waves off Gaza thanks to a donation arranged by an elderly Jewish American surfer. Watersport firms in Israel got together last week and donated 10 surfboards, each worth $450 (US), to children in Gaza at the behest of 87-year-old Dorian Pascowitz, a Hawaii resident who is one of the world's oldest surfers. Yediot Achronot reported that Pascowitz, having heard of the great waves off Gaza, contacted an Israeli friend to find ways of cultivating a generation of Palestinian surfers.

U.S. to train PA troops

U.S. State Department officials will train troops assigned to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas. "The course work and practical exercises will enhance the abilities of the Presidential Guard to carry out their primary function – VIP protection," a department statement said. "This training is part of a series of courses that will be offered this fall through early 2008." The training stems from a deal signed this month by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and PA Prime Minister Salam Fayyad.

Hezbollah threat examined

Hezbollah may have biological or chemical weapons, a top Arab pundit says. Hezbollah's leader, Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, said in a speech this month that, should Israel again go to war in Lebanon, it would face a "surprise that will change the fate of the region." The unspecified threat prompted Abdul Bari Atwan, editor of the London-based newspaper Al-Quds Al-Arabi newspaper, to argue that the Iranian-backed Lebanese group may have weapons of mass-destruction, which could be fitted on missiles that can reach Israel. "Nasrallah is a person who does not lie," Atwan wrote in the influential daily. Hezbollah didn't respond to the article. Israeli officials have not publicly speculated on Nasrallah's threat, made on the anniversary of the ceasefire that ended the Lebanon war.

Families' lawsuit denied

A Kiev appeals court has turned down four Israeli families seeking compensation for a 2001 plane crash. The families had filed lawsuits seeking $1.1 million (US) each from the Ukrainian government for their relatives killed when a Siberian Airlines jet crashed en route from Tel Aviv to Novosibirsk. The plane went down in the Black Sea in October 2001, killing all 66 passengers and 12 crew members. A Moscow air safety group found that the plane was unintentionally shot down by a missile fired by Ukrainian forces during military exercises on the Crimean Peninsula. But on Aug. 21, Kiev's appellate court upheld a Ukrainian lower court's January ruling that disputed the air safety group's findings.

Crematorium torched

Israel's only crematorium was torched. Unknown arsonists set fire Aug. 22 to an outdoor oven belonging to Alei Shalehet, the only Israeli mortuary to offer cremation as an alternative to burial. The attack took place hours after the crematorium's previously secret location, on farmland outside Tel Aviv, was published in a haredi newspaper. Alei Shalehet's owner blamed religious zealots angered at the availability of cremation, which is against Jewish law, in Israel. Police had no initial comment on suspects.

TERRORISM THWARTED

Israeli forces narrowly thwarted a killing spree by armed Palestinian infiltrators from the Gaza Strip. Using a rope ladder, two terrorists clambered over a 30-foot-high security barrier on Gaza's northern border with Israel early Saturday. The infiltration went unnoticed due to heavy fog. The Palestinians intended to attack the Israeli border village of Nativ Ha'asara but, thanks to a navigation error, opened fire on a nearby military position instead. They were shot dead in the ensuing clash. An Israeli soldier was lightly wounded. The Popular Resistance Committees and Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine claimed responsibility for the infiltration. In the above photos, Israeli soldiers bring down the rope ladder left behind by the terrorists.

Emotional Arithmetic focuses on power of Holocaust memory

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Max von Sydow and Susan Sarandon in Emotional Arithmetic

Adapted from the novel by the late Canadian novelist Matt Cohen, Paolo Barzman's Emotional Arithmetic turns on the power of memory as juxtaposed against the backdrop of the Holocaust.

Slated as the closing night movie at the Toronto International Film Festival, which starts on Sept. 6, it is as pensive and complex as its topic.

Taking place on a farm near a beautiful lake in Quebec's bucolic Eastern Townships, it unfolds over the course of what seems like a few days and through the medium of black-and-white flashbacks set in the French transit camp of Drancy. In a typically graphic flashback, a man affixes a yellow star of David on a young woman's lapel and says with dripping irony, "You're now officially one of God's chosen people."

This melancholy film opens as Melanie Winters (Susan Sarandon), a social and political activist who describes herself as a "crazy bitch," readies herself for a special guest, Jakob Bronski (Max von Sydow).

During the German occupation of Paris, Melanie's Jewish American parents disappeared, never to be seen again. Rounded up, Melanie was sent to Drancy, a way station to the Auschwitz death camp in Poland. Bronski – a Polish Jew – protected Melanie and her 13-year-old friend, Christopher Lewis (Gabriel Byrne), a non-Jewish Irish boy who was taken to the camp by the French police in error.

When Drancy was liberated, Bronski lost touch with Melanie and Christopher. But now, decades later, Melanie re-establishes contact with Bronski, who, branded as a malcontent, spent the postwar years in Soviet prison camps and mental institutions.

Out of gratitude for his saving her life, Melanie invites Bronski to Canada. Unexpectedly, Bronski arrives with Christopher, an unmarried, Paris-based entomologist who still loves Melanie after all these years. All three – Melanie, Bronski and Christopher – have been damaged by the Holocaust.

Wracked by panic attacks, breakdowns, impulsive behaviour, survivors' guilt and flashbacks of Drancy, Melanie rues her status as a supposed "second-rate survivor." She believes that, compared to Auschwitz and Dachau, no one has ever heard of Drancy.

Christopher, a solitary, self-contained figure, seems tortured by the past as well, but misses the "sheer joy" of having bonded with Melanie in Drancy. Bronski, once known as the Poet of the Gulag, has stopped writing, the words having dried up, and has fallen prey to bouts of depression during which he fires a rifle into the air.

As suggested by its title, Emotional Arithmetic is also about relationships. Melanie's husband, David (Christopher Plummer), is a cynical and bitter history professor who was forced into retirement by his university. She refers to him as a "moral bankrupt" because of his philandering. His marriage to Melanie has withered, and he is none too pleased by Bronski's and Christopher's presence.

Decrying his wife's "good intentions," David speaks disparagingly of "death camp humour." Resentful of Melanie's obsession with the Holocaust, he flippantly mentions the "six million Jews" who metaphorically inhabit their attic. In another insensitive dig, he observes that she is not a saint simply because she was the victim of a "terrible, apocalyptic event."

David wants Melanie to move on, to shelve the Holocaust, but she cannot. At Drancy, she was an official witness to history, having recorded the names of new arrivals in a notebook. And this she cannot forget.

Benjamin (Roy Dupuis), their doleful son, empathizes with his mother, but feels that she has barely told him anything about her wartime ordeal.

Emotional Arithmetic, propelled by Jefferson Lewis' usually taut, plausible script, grapples realistically with the demons that haunt Holocaust survivors.

The performances, particularly those of Sarandon and Plummer, rise to the occasion. Luc Montpellier's cinematography, whether of a serene lake in autumn or of Drancy at dusk, is evocative and exquisite.

The film loses a measure of its momentum toward the end, but on balance, it retains its spell and remains true to Cohen's vision.

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Eight photographers – four Muslim and four Jewish – are using their cameras to fight intolerance in a new exhibit titled "A Light Unto the Nations," which opens at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre on Sept 9 and runs until Oct. 12.

The exhibit first ran at the Contact Toronto Photography Festival in May, and then moved to the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre from July 26 until Aug. 31.

While surfing the Internet in 2004, Rochelle Michaels came across some anti-Semitic Jewish conspiracy and Holocaust denial sites. They inspired her to contact Muslim and Jewish artists and create an exhibit that tries to break common assumptions about the quest for peace in the Middle East and show that peace is truly desired by everyone.

> An exhibit that tries to break common assumptions

"I'm not a reader," Michaels said. "For me, the most impactful thing is the image – glancing at the image above the fold on a newspaper will make the most lasting impression."

While not all the works in the exhibit deal directly with the topic of peace, they revolve around ideas of tolerance, freedom, hope and the consequences of intolerance.

One striking, two-part image set by Jewish photographer Gilad Benari features a sleeping infant, labeled Peacemaker. Below it, a second image called Combat DNA depicts a double helix constructed from bullets.

Another powerful image by Muslim photographer Lamya Gargash shows a close-up of a woman's face, with only her large eyes visible. The rest of her face is covered with newsprint-style paper full of Arabic words.

In a description of the piece, Gargash explains that the photo deals with censorship in the Middle East, and the conflict and tension that arises from the desire for westernization while maintaining cultural and religious values.

Exhibit may tour university campuses

Gargash writes that the photo is "utilizing the notion of the extreme in a manner where it is still represented in a fashion-like approach and where the femininity of the subject is still clear."

Touring JCCs is just the beginning for Michaels, who wants to bring the exhibit to university campuses.

She said campuses are often politically left-leaning, to the point of "demonizing" Israel. Michaels believes that aiming the exhibit's messages of peace, hope, freedom and tolerance at students will have positive consequences for the future, because they are our future leaders, she said.

"It just felt right," she said about targeting her exhibit at young people.

"Adults will go to the library, or read a newspaper, with their ideas more or less formed. This isn't meaning to say the exhibit can't help others understand a different perspective." However, Michaels said she believes the exhibit will have more of an impact on youth.

She said she has received extremely positive responses to the exhibit so far, many of which are encapsulated in guest books.

She said that everyone who sees the exhibit has a different favourite piece, highlighting the diversity and intricacy of the works on display.

"If someone is going to come in and lose an assumption that they have, that means the world to me," she said.

Eye on Arts

By BILL GLADSTONE

OKLAHOMA! AT STRATFORD IS AN EXUBERANT TREAT

It's well worth the drive to Stratford to see the wonderful and unabashedly old-fashioned production of Oklahoma! currently gracing the stage of the Stratford Festival's Festival Theatre.

The simple but well-constructed story focuses on Laurey, a farm girl torn between two beaus, one angelic, the other demonic, with only a wise old aunt as guide. Just as Laurey tries to tame and domesticate her demon lover, so, too, the good-hearted folk of the territory try to tame and domesticate the land in readiness for statehood. Fortunately, goodness wins out and Laurey chooses the beau she was meant to have all along.

This lavish production seems to present an authentic version of what audiences encountered when the Rodgers and Hammerstein musical debuted on Broadway in 1943. Suffice to say that the original broke box-office records with a run of more than five years, then broke other records with a three-year run in London and a national tour that lasted a decade.

Strange that Oklahoma! appeared in 1943, since its optimism and imagery of exuberant abundance (corn "as high as an elephant's eye") seems more in keeping with the postwar boom than the difficult and strapped wartime years. However, its theme of "innocence dallying with evil" might be regarded as a veiled allegory for what America was encountering overseas.

If the emotional drama is too light to win us over on its own, the dazzling stagecraft, music and dancing soon do the job. Director Donna Feore and the exceptionally strong cast have given us an outstanding theatrical experience. At Stratford's Festival Theatre until Nov. 4. www.stratfordfestival.ca

Duo gets seniors fit as a fiddle

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

A guitar, fiddle, drums, spoons, two voices and a boa can bring a surprising amount of fun and entertainment to a group of seniors.

Margot Glatt and Aidan Mason are the brains and performers behind Fit as a Fiddle Canada.

For the past two years, they have been bringing entertainment and fitness into retirement homes with their upbeat, diverse one-hour performances.

"It's fun – we do it for the fun," Glatt said. "It's extremely gratifying to look out and see how the spirits in the room are just lifted."

Glatt has a background in music as well as in teaching fitness. In her Fit as a Fiddle Canada shows, she sings, dances, plays spoons and drums, and also leads an eight-minute "light fitness" set.

At a recent Forest Hill Place performance, her solo Charleston dance really got the crowd excited.

The group of seniors in the audience joined in for rousing choruses of classics such as You Are My Sunshine, Que Sera, Sera and Has Anybody Seen My Girl?.

Mason, who has been playing guitar professionally for decades, also sang and fiddled in the show. The crowd particularly enjoyed his Elvis medley and lively rendition of The Lion Sleeps Tonight.

He explained during the show that the song actually originates in South Africa, where Mason, who is Chinese, grew up.

In fact, the show featured dance and music from around the globe, with songs such as When Irish Eyes Are Smiling, the Italian classic That's Amore and a hula set during which some brave seniors joined in, complete with leis.

Mason and Glatt met five years ago. Mason, who had never played fiddle, saw one at Glatt's house and taught himself to play, just for the purpose of creating an act together.

"We thought, 'How could we best combine our talents?'" he remembered.

Fit as a Fiddle Canada has several different shows and tries to adapt to their audience, said Glatt. They had seven performances scheduled for the month of August, and both Glatt and Mason agreed that business is picking up steadily.

Glatt and Mason plan to continue developing their act and hope to play more often and for larger crowds. They also have a CD in the works, set for release in the next few months.

Writing the religious life

Disobedience by Naomi Alderman, Touchstone.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

Religious life is little discussed in postwar Jewish fiction, though a young generation of writers, whose biography often includes an Orthodox upbringing, has recently made it the focus of their work.

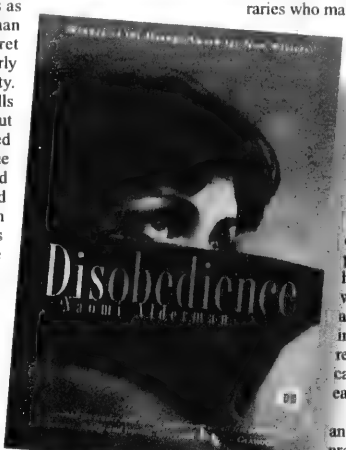
Nathan Englander and Allegra Goodman are the most prominent among these in the United States, while Naomi Alderman's first novel, Disobedience, has gained her much attention in her native England, as well as in North America.

Alderman's take on religious themes is unambiguous and provocative: British Orthodoxy, as it is lived in the London suburb of Hendon, is a source of oppressive conformity. Although the novel is told from more than one point of view, its key voice is that of Ronit Krushka, who returns to London upon the death of her father, Rav Krushka. The longtime spiritual leader of a Hendon synagogue, the rav is eulogized in the Anglo-Jewish press as "a giant in his generation."

Alderman is deft at unravelling the details behind Ronit's abandonment of her father's world in favour of the life of a secular financial analyst in Manhattan. Her return trip to England places her at the centre of old emotional entanglements. Most importantly, she must contend with the advances of an old friend – now married – with whom she shared an adolescent love affair.

The old friend is Esti Kuperman, whose youthful love for Ronit continues to guide her life. Esti is, as Ronit sees it, in the closet, quietly estranged from her ineffectual husband, as well as from her own suppressed desires.

In Alderman's Hendon, femininity and gayness are fragile identities, the first constrained by neatly delimited roles, the second entirely prohibited. Ronit considers that "being gay, being Jewish… have a lot in common. You don't choose it, that's the first thing. If you are, you are … The second thing is that both those states – gayness, Jewishness – are invisible… while you don't have a choice about what you are, you have a choice about what you show."



With these predicaments as her guiding motifs, Alderman aims to explore the secret aspects of an otherwise orderly and conventional society. Hendon is a "village," she tells us. It is linked to London, but "in Hendon all that is needed has been provided: Torah-true schools and kosher shops and synagogues and mikvahs and businesses that are closed on the Sabbath and matchmakers and burial societies… Like the turtle, we carry our home with us. We believe that we may soon have to depart for other shores."

Here Alderman presents one of her favourite motifs with regard to contemporary Jewish life – Golders Green High Road, like any other major Jewish centre, is seen to be the haven of an exilic imagination, where inhabitants dwell in relative isolation, only tenuously connected with the broader society.

In a rare evocation of the rightness of such an existence, Alderman allows that "God is in all places, high and low, distant and near at hand. As surely as He is anywhere, God is in Hendon."

Though Disobedience is at times introspective and philosophical with regard to Jewish life and belief, its tone is typically satiric, expressing a hip, big-city woman's attitude toward what she sees as the narrowness of her girlhood existence. The young women of Hendon – Ronit's contemporaries who married, raised children and involved themselves in her father's spiritual community – receive particularly harsh treatment. It is this approach to her material that guaranteed what Alderman has called her "worst reviews" in the Orthodox press.

About this reception she has said that no "community likes to see itself written about, especially one which has concentrated as hard on remaining invisible as the Orthodox community in Britain."

This account of her own reception is at once revealing and too easy, since there are particularities in a writer's approach and tone, her intimacy or distance from her material, which affect the way she is read. But just such a critical response has favoured writers' careers in the past, as it lends a note of notoriety and relevance to their work. Philip Roth and Mordecai Richler profited from a similar vilification early on.

Alderman's portraits of English Jewish social and family mores are often caricatures. This approach lends the novel a programmatic quality, as the satire tends toward the obvious and predictable. "It's being here," Ronit muses, "that's the problem. It's being back here with all those little couples sitting in their identical houses producing identical children.

"It was seeing them in synagogue, all those women in their smart Shabbat suits and their perfectly matched hats and each woman appropriately paired to a man, preferably with a child tugging at each arm… the whole set – like Orthodox Jew Barbie: comes complete with Orthodox Ken, two small children, the house, the car and a selection of kosher foodstuffs."

Who among Orthodox readers or reviewers would find anything redeeming here?

But Alderman is more sophisticated in her rendering of the problematics of being gay in Hendon. Here her characters are compelling and the impact of a schoolgirl romance on Ronit and Esti's adult life is drawn in effective, lyrical set pieces. It is the back half of the novel that is most satisfying in its portrait of a renewed but deeply troubled attraction between the two women.

And in this context the neighbourhood is no longer a target of satire, but an atmospheric backdrop for Ronit's confrontation with her past. In these chapters Hendon takes on a softer, less specifically Jewish character: "There are parks in Hendon… sweeping down to the Brent Cross Flyover and the A41. Once upon a time, long ago, there were farms here and farm people. Traces remain: stone-built houses and ancient roads with crooked names… Hendon, lacking age and wealth, remembers the seed and the soil."

The final pages of Disobedience depict a kind of accommodation in Ronit's life, between her Orthodox upbringing and her Manhattan lifestyle. This development seems rushed and is not entirely convincing. In the novel's preceding pages, Ronit's feminist and gay inclinations make such an outcome unlikely. But Alderman chooses for Ronit a late recognition that "there is a tiny, tenuous area where good sense intersects with fundamentalist religion. She's trying out how it feels to live in that area, at least some of the time."

To those who know little about contemporary Jewish life, this ending may seem generous. To those who know more about the predicaments that inform Ronit's dual identity, such details will likely seem too thorny for an upbeat outcome.

Norman Ravvin's books include Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue and the novel Lola by Night. He is chair of Concordia University's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Give your child a great start to the school year!

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

Back to school is an exciting time of the year – brand new school supplies, freshly sharpened pencils and the crisp autumn air put you in the right frame of mind for a brisk new start and a clean slate to begin anew.

Even if you're not going back to school in the fall, there's something about September that spells new beginnings.

So here is some life coaching advice to kick start your way to a successful new year!

First of all, if you are a parent or grandparent, remind your children that it is very normal to feel a little anxious on the first day of school. Let them know that their teachers are aware of this and will try even harder to make everyone feel as comfortable as possible. But there are also some specific things you can do as a parent to make the transition from the summer months to the school year smoother and more graceful.

Begin by pointing out all of the positive and even exciting aspects of starting school. Talk about how much fun it will be to see old friends and make new ones. Remind the children of the fun they have had in the past at school, and tell them you have confidence in them that they will do their best.

Give your children a toolkit full of tools they can use all year long, and keep replenishing it with new ideas. One of the tools can be how to develop good study habits. You can help your child by creating an environment that is conducive to doing homework. Children need a permanent work area in their bedroom or another part of the house, where they can have privacy.

For some children, sitting around the kitchen table and doing their work with company is the best option. Find out what works well and then stick to it. Set aside ample time for homework and establish a routine. I just heard of a great TV rule. Your children can get five to 10 coupons or vouchers that are each worth 30 minutes of TV. Every time they watch a program, they have to hand in one of the coupons or vouchers. Then, when the five or 10 have been used, they know that their television watching is over for that week. This will teach them time management, planning and responsibility. You can alter the amount of television time depending on the age of the child or time of year.

Try to be available to answer questions when your children are doing homework, but be careful not to do it for them. You can do this if you simply offer suggestions but ultimately let them figure out how to do the work. Also, if your child is struggling with a certain subject, look into a tutor, which can be a great solution. This way you are preventing the cold rather than having to cure it later.

Involve your children in the back to school excitement by shopping with them for school supplies, new running shoes and a new outfit or a new T-shirt for their first day back.

Another great tool is to get into the habit of having them pack up their knapsack the night before and leave it at the door, so that there is no early morning panic. Also, plan fun lunches together and get your child involved in the menu and selection.

As well, get into some healthy bedtime routines so that your children are well rested for school. To break the more relaxed summer schedule, start the new routine a few nights before school starts to give your children a chance to adjust to the new bedtime.

Give your children some icebreakers (not the candy!) for the first day back, for example, a favourite ball, some marbles, a "Skip-it" skipping rope, action figures or playing cards.

Buy a great scheduling tool like an agenda book to help your children stay organized. Help them by colour coding their schedule and their activities. Make the time to talk to your children about their day and ensure they feel listened to. Then they can come to you with their worries and their joyful experiences.

Teach your children to be positive and enthusiastic people. They will feel great and everyone around them will also benefit from their positive energy.

Ask them to choose one area they want to excel in and write down what their goal for the year is. Then take action steps towards that goal and watch this become one of their best years ever!

Circumcision doesn't dull sensitivity, study says

MONTREAL – McGill University researchers using the latest technology may have finally debunked the belief that circumcised men experience reduced sexual sensation compared to those who are uncircumcised.

The study, published in the May issue of the Journal of Sexual Medicine, consisted of genital sensory testing conducted on circumcised and uncircumcised volunteers between the ages of 18 and 45. Both groups were tested during states of sexual arousal and non-arousal, and results showed no difference between the two groups in genital sensitivity to touch or pain.

"It was interesting how well-accepted this notion [that circumcision dulled sensation] was, despite the fact that there was no empirical basis for it," said Kimberly Payne, the article's principal author.

Research involving direct measurement of penile sensation had previously only been undertaken in groups of sexually functional and dysfunctional men and never in sexually aroused subjects, said Payne, so there was no data about how arousal affected sensation in the general population.

To address these issues, the test participants were fitted with DVD goggles and placed behind privacy curtains to reduce extraneous stimulation, while alternately viewing erotic and non-erotic control films. At the same time, tiny disposable filaments were applied to different areas on the penis and forearm at five-second intervals to measure sensation.

"There had been self-report studies in the past, where questionnaires were given to people," said Payne. "However, we wanted to focus on producing some observable, measurable data."

In response to the erotic stimulus, both groups showed a significant increase in penile temperature, which correlated highly with subjective reports of sexual arousal. Uncircumcised men had significantly lower penile temperature than circumcised men, and evidenced a larger increase in penile temperature with sexual arousal. No differences in genital sensitivity were found between the circumcised and uncircumcised groups.

Payne, now a clinical psychologist in Ottawa, conducted the study as an adjunct to her doctoral research while working under the supervision of McGill psychology professor Yitzchak (Irv) Binik, director of the Sex and Couple Therapy Service at the McGill University Health Centre/Royal Victoria Hospital.

Binik was co-author of the study, along with graduate students Lea Thaler and Tuuli Kukkonen and Dr. Serge Carrier of Montreal's Jewish General Hospital.

Payne cautioned that although the study's results are very promising, they are still preliminary and don't necessarily resolve many of the longstanding controversies surrounding circumcision.

"This study only measures one sensation, so it questions the held notions, but it does not refute the idea that there may be some differences at some level. No one can deny the anatomical differences between a circumcised and uncircumcised penis."

ADL causes uproar with recognition of genocide

JTA and Ha'retz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ANKARA — Turkey is pressing Israel to help reverse the Anti-Defamation League's new position on the Armenian genocide.

Turkey's foreign minister, Abdullah Gul, reportedly told Israel's ambassador in Ankara, Pinhas Avivi, that Israel could have done more to prevent the ADL's shift, Ha'aretz reported.

In a dramatic reversal, the ADL last week described World War I massacres of Armenians by Ottoman Turks as "tantamount to genocide," after declining for years to take a position on the question.

The ADL and its president, Abraham Foxman, had faced mounting criticism in recent weeks for refusing to use the genocide label and for firing Andrew Tarsy, the head of the organization's Boston office, who publicly challenged that policy.

Tarsy's dismissal sparked a furious backlash from local community leaders – including critical statements from prominent Boston Jews, a "community statement" calling for the ADL to change its position, and the resignation of two members of the ADL's regional board.

Along with other major Jewish groups, the ADL has said the genocide question should be resolved by historians rather than by the U.S. Congress. Their position is motivated in part by concern for Israel's close military alliance with Turkey and for the country's Jews, who have warned that a resolution now under consideration by the U.S. Congress recognizing the genocide could create problems for them.

Earlier this year, the ADL – along with the American Jewish Committee, B'nai Brith International, and the Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs – transmitted a letter from Turkish Jews to congressional leaders opposing the legislation.

But in a statement issued Aug. 21, the ADL said, "We have never negated but have always described the painful events of 1915-1918 perpetrated by the Ottoman Empire against the Armenians as massacres and atrocities."

"On reflection, we have come to share the view of Henry Morgenthau, Sr. [the U.S. ambassador to the Ottoman Empire during World War I] that the consequences of those actions were indeed tantamount to genocide. If the word genocide had existed then, they would have called it genocide," the statement said.

The Gul-Avivi meeting, which became "shrill" according to Israeli Foreign Ministry sources, seemed to confirm the seriousness with which the Turks view the prospect of a congressional resolution.

Jewish officials have publicly expressed concern that such a resolution could affect Israel's strategic relationship with Turkey, American interests in the Middle East, and potentially the security of the Turkish Jewish community. The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations is now conducting discussions on the matter.

The ADL had been under fire for for its position and its refusal to endorse the Congressional resolution. After reversing itself last week and calling the massacres a genocide, the ADL almost immediately issued a second statement reiterating its opposition to the resolution and supporting efforts by Turkey and Armenia to resolve this issue by themselves.

Meanwhile, Israeli President Shimon Peres assured Turkish Prime Minister Recep Tayyip Erdogan last week that Israel has not changed its position on the killing of 1.5 million Armenians during World War I.

In his conversation with Erdogan, Peres reiterated the Israeli position that Turkey and Armenia should resolve the dispute on the nature of the killings through dialogue. Jerusalem is careful not to refer to the killings as a genocide.

Following the ADL's statement, Turkey was feeling "disappointed with its friends," Erdogan said.

Peres told him that Israel does not control U.S. Jewish organizations, which pursue their own agendas.

Foreign Ministry sources told Ha'aretz that they believe that Peres' efforts and the calming actions of the Israeli embassy in Ankara have helped ease tensions over the ADL's statement.

Turkish media reported over the weekend that Foxman sent Erdogan a letter stating the ADL has "utmost respect for the Turkish people."

"We had no intention to put the Turkish people or its leaders in a difficult position. I am writing this letter to you to express our sorrow over what we have caused for the leadership and people of Turkey in the past few days," Foxman's letter reportedly read.

Meanwhile, also last week, the Jewish community's main umbrella body on Israel affairs began debating whether or not to take a position on the issue and the related congressional resolution.

Abe Foxman

The Conference of Presidents held a conference call early on Aug. 22 to discuss adopting a position. The call came a day after the ADL's statement, and a day after the executive director of the American Jewish Committee, David Harris, took a similar step in a piece on the website of the Jerusalem Post.

Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents, confirmed that member organizations were discussing the matter. Sources said that Foxman defended his organization's new position during the conference call.

Despite their public statements last week, both the ADL and the AJC continue to oppose the proposed U.S. congressional resolution that would declare the massacres a genocide. Foxman has cited concerns about harming Israeli-Turkish relations and the security of the Jewish community in Turkey. Harris dismissed those worries, but said a congressional resolution could end up hurting U.S. strategic interests and ties with Turkey, which adamantly rejects the genocide label.

But Morton Klein, president of the Zionist Organization of America, told JTA that his organization thinks it's "imperative for Jews to acknowledge the truth of the Turkish genocide against Armenians, notwithstanding Turkey's relationship with Israel." He also voiced support for the congressional resolution.

"Acknowledging that truth of a century ago doesn't indict the present Turkish people or the present Turkish government, just like acknowledging the Holocaust doesn't indict the present German people or the present German government," Klein said. He added: "It's high time for Turkey to acknowledge that truth of history and move on."

When asked in a Boston Globe interview last month if he believed what happened to the Armenians was genocide, Foxman was quoted as saying: "I don't know." Critics argued that Foxman's remark portrayed the issue as open to debate, with some calling it genocide denial.

ADL insists the change stems from its concern for Jewish unity at a moment of great peril for communities around the world.

"I was just disheartened by how the Jewish community was being torn apart," Foxman told JTA Aug. 21 as he travelled to Boston to meet with community leaders. "We were being criticized by other Jewish organizations. And out of a tremendous concern to keep that unity, because the Jewish community is under increased attack in Europe, Latin America and even in this country, the imperative is to try to find unity."

The turnaround comes just weeks before the release of Foxman's new book, The Most Dangerous Lies: The Israel Lobby and the Myth of Jewish Control. Foxman, whose book attempts to debunk claims that Jewish groups stifle debate on Israel and control U.S. foreign policy, said that some advocates of these views were emboldened by the attacks on the ADL.

The ADL had faced a budding rebellion on the part of the organization's Boston leadership, which adopted two resolutions on the issue this month, one expressing confidence in Tarsy and the other supporting legislation in Congress acknowledging the Armenian genocide.

Two prominent members of the ADL's regional board – former chairman of the Polaroid Corp., Stewart Cohen, and Boston City Council member Mike Ross – reportedly resigned in protest over the issue.

The ADL has been under fire since the Armenian community in Watertown, Mass., one of the country's largest, began agitating to have the town rescind its participation in "No Place for Hate," a popular anti-bigotry program that the ADL sponsors.

On Aug. 14, the town council unanimously voted to end its relationship with the program, and other Massachusetts communities were reported to be considering similar moves.

Watertown's Armenian community was piqued by the ADL's longtime refusal to support the congressional legislation, which is vigorously opposed by Turkey, Israel's closest Muslim ally.

Despite the shift on the genocide question, Foxman said he still doesn't support the legislative measure, which he described in his Aug. 21 statement as "a counterproductive diversion" that could threaten the Turkish Jewish community and "the important multilateral position between Turkey, Israel and the United States."

That position is exceedingly unpopular in Boston, where a large Armenian population has developed close ties with the Jewish community. The Jewish Community Relations Council of Greater Boston, the Combined Jewish Philanthropies, the David Project, and eight other groups signed on to a "community statement" Aug. 20 urging the ADL to reconsider its position.

"We must never forget the Armenian genocide and maintain our guard against those who deny its occurrence," that statement said. "We stand with them and in support of the local Armenian community, who like the Jews, have suffered greatly at the hands of others."

An early version of the statement had also called for Tarsy's reinstatement, but that clause was later dropped.

"Abe Foxman had every right in the world to fire Andy Tarsy," said Nancy Kaufman, executive director of the Boston JCRC. Tarsy "knew what he was doing."

In response to the ADL's reversal, the Boston JCRC released its own statement saluting the change.

Harris, of the AJC, said that his group has long recognized the killings as a genocide, but has not taken a position on the congressional resolution out of concern for U.S. strategic interests in the Middle East. "We know from the experience of France that when the French Parliament tackled this issue not long ago it created a very immediate set of ramifications in French-Turkish relations," Harris said. He questioned if, at a sensitive moment for American interests in the Middle East, it made sense to pursue the congressional route.

Peer bows out in round-of-16 at Rogers Cup

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to the CJN

Israeli star Shahar Peer has never seen a tennis ball she couldn't return.

Peer thrilled fans at Toronto's Rexall Centre during the recent $1.3 million Rogers Cup Canadian Open championships with her hustle and groundstrokes in three matches, ending with a round-of-16 finish.

What made the 18th-ranked Peer's performance breathtaking was her belief that she can prevail no matter the match score.

In the opening round, Peer couldn't capitalize on three break points and trailed Michaella Krajicek of The Netherlands 0-4 before turning the tables.

Peer responded to her sub-par play by winning the next seven of eight games, relying largely on first serves and groundstroke winners to take the first set 7-5. In the second set, Peer lost serve and trailed 0-3 before rallying again by winning six of the next eight and a 9-7 tie-break to win the match.

Against Tathiana Garbin of Italy in the second round, Peer lost serve and trailed 0-2 before winning six of the next seven games to win the first set 6-3.

In the second set, she continued to hit winners on both forehand and backhand, never dropping serve to emerge with a 6-3, 6-2 victory.

Peer's luck ran out under windy conditions in her third-round match against Virginie Razzano of France, losing 4-6, 3-6. Peer held serve only once in the first set and despite breaking Razzano twice, she could not capitalize.

"I often start slow and sometimes make mistakes early in the match. But then I find my rhythm, move better and step into the balls to end the points quickly. I have to play and not think about the score, but how I could win, no matter who the opponent is," Peer said after her second round victory.

"Peer is a great fighter who runs down every shot. Her feistiness and mental strength give her a big edge over most players. I expect Shahar's rankings to continue to rise and that she will be a big star in women's tennis for many years," said former Rogers Cup champion Tracy Austin, the TSN and CBC commentator at the Rogers Cup.

"Shahar is so beloved in Israel that without a doubt she is the most popular female athlete we've ever had," said Miki Sagui, a sports reporter for Israel's Ynetnews website who covered Peer's matches at the Rogers Cup. "Her matches are televised in Israel all the time, and she brings relief to the constant news of security and politics."

This past April, Canadians saw first hand how tough the 20-year-old Peer can be when she won her two singles matches to lead Israel to a Fed Cup win against Canada at Kamloops, B.C.

Peer then won two more single matches in July in Austria to secure another victory for Israel in Fed Cup play. Her victories – she is undefeated in two years of Fed Cup play – have led Israel to its highest ranking ever (eighth among 91 nations) in 35 years. Despite a modest budget for tennis development programs, Israel is currently ranked higher than Canada, Australia and Great Britain.

Peer's achievements include finishing in the fourth round or better at Grand Slam events and earning $1.3 million (US) since turning pro in 2004. Her success has made her a celebrity in Israel and she regularly receives calls from Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, congratulating her on her victories.

Peer has used her celebrity status to draw support to the Shahar Peer Foundation for Ethiopian Jews in Israel.

"Everyone in Israel has been so good to me that I want to give back to others. Ethiopian Jewish children do not have the opportunity to get ahead, and I want to raise funds for them to have a better opportunity to go to school and pursue opportunities for success," she said.

Born and raised in Makabim, a West Bank settlement, Peer took up tennis at age six. By age 14 in 2001, she won the prestigious Orange Bowl 14s title, and in 2004, she became the first Israeli to win the Australian Junior Open.

Peer was one of four Jewish players competing at the Rogers Cup. None of the other Jewish players (Sharon Fichman of Toronto; Israeli Tzipi Obziler and Stephanie Cohen-Alaro of France) survived the qualifying rounds.

Fichman, 16, achieved a personal milestone by becoming the first Canadian Jew to win her first qualifying match at the Rogers Cup since Carrie-Lynn Cohen of Toronto won in 1989. Fichman defeated Cohen-Alaro 6-3, 7-6 (4) before losing 6-3, 6-1 to Dominika Cibulkova of Slovakia.

Fichman has taken a three month break from playing international junior tennis.

"I needed the break but will continue to play tennis again. I have a few more years to decide whether to play tennis in college or turn pro. I look forward to continuing to play tennis at a high level, " she said.

Israel Baseball League has first-ever champion

JTA

JERUSALEM — The first season of the Israel Baseball League drew to a close last week, with the Bet Shemesh Blue Sox shutting out the Modi'in Miracle 3-0 in Petach Tikva for the championship.

Managed by Ron Blomberg, a former New York Yankee slugger and Major League Baseball's first designated hitter, the Blue Sox dominated the title game behind pitcher Rafael Bergstrom.

The Blue Sox led the league throughout the eight-week season. Players, many of them Jewish, were recruited from around the world, including the United States and the Dominican Republic.

As Commissioner Dan Kurtzer bestowed the Blue Sox with its trophy, Blomberg said, "I've been in two World Series with the New York Yankees, and this championship lives up to both."

Back home putting myself together

Sandie Benitah
20Something

When I first moved out, I found it so tough being on my own, I longed for the days when I lived with 24-hour care and support. But like every overprotected child, I very quickly came to appreciate this new life in which I could finally discover what I was made of.

Throughout the first year of my moving out, I often thought of people who had to move back home to regroup for a while and each time they crossed my mind, I was sooooo positive that would never be me, no matter how hard it got.

I should have known to never say never. Four months after the passing of my boyfriend, here I still am, home at my mom's.

As much as I certainly appreciate living with someone who finds such irrational pleasure in cooking for me and cleaning up after me, I have to admit, it's been a real challenge.

I've been racking my brain trying to figure out what I find so unsettling. It's not my new roommate, as my mom has been more than patient and generous with me. I still have my privacy, though my private space has been reduced from an entire apartment to one room. I'm now closer to family and friends though I have to drive each time I go out, rather than just walk out my downtown building's front door. I'm even eating better than ever considering I now have home-cooked meals instead of my own over-cooked meals at home.

But at least all those burnt meals were my own.

It's absolutely shocking to see how easy it is to get back to old routines. When I moved out, I was Miss Responsibility; grocery shopping on Saturdays, laundry on Sundays, new recipe trial every Monday…

When I moved back here, there was no doubt in my mind that I would pitch in with everything. But of course, since I moved back, I have not used anything but a microwave and have not bought anything for the house other than new shoes to ruin the carpet with.

I guess I should find solace in the fact I still do my own laundry, but I hate that I have let myself regress to this point.

There's something about being on your own that forces you to become a problem solver rather than just a complainer. No matter how hard or hectic life may get when you're on your own, you still have full control over your life.

You don't have to do the dishes if you don't want to, but you have to deal with the consequences of them sitting in the sink for a week. Each decision is yours, yours to take full responsibility for. When you live with your parents, God bless them, they seem all too happy to take on that responsibility for you.

Let me make it clear – I know how lucky I am to even have a loving home to come back to. I have one friend who can never go home, no matter how badly her luck runs out. She spends a lot of time crying with frustration, but even though I wouldn't ever want to trade places with her, I envy that she'll come out of it saying she did it on her own.

Whatever doesn't break you makes you stronger, says that old cliché. How can we ever really get strong if our parents' home is always there to cushion us from breaking too hard?

I guess the fact that we have this unconditional love to fall back on is what makes us stronger because if we did break too hard, chances are we would never be put back together completely the right way.

I'm still putting myself back together my way: it's just that moving back home, I now have a loving guide by my side to remind me where the pieces fit.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My 93-year-old dad passed away last month. This has been a very difficult time for me, as we were extremely close. He was my confidant, my pillar and my friend. Although in the last couple of years, he deteriorated physically, his mind was sharp as a tack. I lost my mother when I was quite young, so my father took over the role of both parents.

I found the shivah very difficult. I know that most of the people had good intentions, but many of them made reference to the fact that he was 93 and lived a good, long life, which implies to me that his death is not so tragic. I know in my heart that he did have a long life, but it doesn't hurt any less than if he had been 63. I wanted more time, and just because he was 93 doesn't make it hurt any less. I never quite knew how to respond, but I wanted to shout "He was my father, not a 93-year-old man who was lucky enough to make it to a ripe old age." How do I get my message across without sounding ungrateful for their support?

Wanted More Time

Dear Wanted More Time

Saying goodbye to a parent is never easy. For many people, a shivah is uncomfortable. Often, people don't know what to say or do. People are generally well-meaning, so they look for a silver lining in a tragic situation. The fact that your father was 93 when he died is their silver lining. It doesn't make what they said right, it just makes it understandable.

You not only had a wonderful relationship with your father, you were able to enjoy him and interact with him until the end. This is everyone's wish: to be able to live a long and healthy life, and to have their loved ones do the same. On a subconscious level, they are transferring this wish that they have for themselves to your situation. They are not privy to your deep loss and grief. That's very personal. Just understand that those people who came to the shivah came because they care and wanted to pay their respects and be with you during this difficult time.

There is very little anyone can say or do to take your pain away. Just remember: no one can take away what the two of you shared. You will carry that with you forever.

Peace and love at Camp Manitou

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

The 1960s was a decade when love and peace were in the air and flower power convinced millions that we could change the world forever. It was an idyllic time.

This past summer, I was reminded of some of those tranquil feelings when I visited Camp Manitou.

Camp Manitou is owned and operated by Mark Diamond and Jeff Wilson, two very soulful guys. It is an expensive place to send your children, and I was expecting the stereotypical "rich kids" camp with attitude and wardrobes befitting Paris Hilton. What I found among the campers instead was a deep sense of warmth and caring in which love abounded.

Camp Manitou, meaning "place of great spirit," is indeed a beautiful place with all the amenities one would want. It is described on its website as being "nestled in the great northern forests of Muskoka, carved out along iridescent blue lakes and rivers."

Indeed, Camp Manitou has superlative facilities and activities, including the Manitou Tennis Academy, progressive art programs and theatre, but the attraction to the place seemed to come more from the very positive energy I sensed everywhere.

My re-evaluation of the camp began when I spoke to the campers by the waterfront, helping to launch community week, when campers and staff visit nearby towns assisting in tikkun olam activities.

I spoke about the gift these kids have being able to attend a northern Ontario paradise and reminded them of the impoverished Israeli children and terrified children in Darfur who would never have such an opportunity. They listened closely, and it was evident by their attentive looks that they agreed. Later, dozens of Manitou staff and campers told me with great sincerity that they understood how fortunate they are.

At a counsellor-in-training (CIT) workshop, I listened to story after story from the CITs about their response to our world's humanitarian needs. Not a single voice espoused the view that the homeless are grubby and deserve the life they live. This was unusual, as this hardened view is frequently expressed by some young people in groups I speak with.

The morning after my arrival, I saw a young man sitting by my cabin playing guitar. We played some blues together and soon enough a group of five or so other staffers joined us.

Over the next hour, I listened to their unreserved and honest descriptions of Camp Manitou. They said Mark and Jeff bring a certain tenderness and kindness to the place that can be felt throughout the grounds and within the cabins.

One girl said the first day she arrived at camp, she was terrified at not knowing a single person. To her delight, the campers in her cabin greeted her with hugs and kisses, welcoming her to a summer that would ultimately change her life.

The older campers, I was told, and was witness to, were dedicated to helping the younger ones. It was wonderful to watch a nine-year-old camper run up to a 15-year-old, hug her and then be lifted in the air and spun around. Love was everywhere. I could hear it, see it and feel it.

I think Camp Manitou is the real deal. At the camp, helping others grow seems to be more powerful than raw competition. Things such as scaring the younger kids late at night and drug problems do not seem to be inherent in the fibre of the Camp Manitou experience. Quite the opposite.

I believe that what exists at Camp Manitou is an authentic communal bond, similar to the one of the '60s, that allows young people to learn about love, beauty and understanding. I only wish I could be young again so I could experience it for an entire summer of my own.

A passerby focuses on a poster of Gilad Shalit at a 21st birthday celebration for the kidnapped soldier in Tel Aviv last week. [Israel Sun photo]

A sad 21st birthday

The family of Gilad Shalit, the kidnapped Israeli soldier, last week organized a public celebration at Rabin Square in Tel Aviv of Shalit's 21st birthday. It was the second birthday the young soldier has spent in captivity. He was kidnapped by Hamas gunmen on June 26, 2006.

Shalit's father, Noam, was critical of the Israeli government's efforts to secure his son's release. "After so many days of Gilad's captivity, and after so many attempts to get him back, we see a clear and utter failure of the system."

"It was important to mark the event in some very modest way," Noam said, "and to show the public that my son has still not come back after two birthdays, 14 months and 429 days."

The organizers of the event gave out stickers that said, "Gilad Shalit, we're waiting at home for you."

Durban II sets off alarm bells

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There may still be two years to go before "Durban II" convenes as a followup to the infamous World Conference Against Racism held in South Africa in 2001, but for two observers of the United Nations, "alarm bells" are already going off.

Hillel Neuer

Hillel Neuer, spokesperson for UN Watch in Geneva, and Irwin Cotler, human rights critic for the Liberal Party, say the election of Libya to chair a 20-nation organizing bureau and the inclusion of Iran on the committee are ominous signs that suggest the 2009 UN World Conference Against Racism will be hijacked by an anti-Israel forces.

Speaking from his office in Geneva, site of the UN Human Rights Council, Neuer said a speech by the Libyan ambassador on racism and human rights given after he was warmly received by UN High Commissioner on Human Rights Louise Arbour "was surreal and revolting."

The Human Rights Council, which is co-ordinating and planning the Durban II conference, approved the Libyan ambassador by acclamation. While the United States and Israel were not participants, some European countries approved the selection, he said, noting "western nations are tripping over themselves to trade oil and weapons with Libya."

Cuba was voted in as vice-chair of the bureau and Arbour will serve as its secretary general.

Even at the planning stage, Islamic countries through the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) are attempting to steer the Durban II conference toward "the issue of religious discrimination and defamation of Islam." It also "wants the spotlight moved to the plight of the Palestinians," Neuer said.

Durban II is supposed to be limited to reviewing implementation of the program adopted at Durban I. Islamic states, however, are attempting to introduce new charges against the West – of Islamophobia, religious profiling, and defamation of religions, Neuer stated.

Appeal In Ross Case

TORONTO — The man convicted in May of killing Alicia Ross last summer is appealing both his conviction and his sentence. Daniel Sylvester, 33, said the trial judge, Superior Court Justice Edwin Minden, erred when he allowed evidence about his sexual conduct after Ross' death to be introduced in court, the Toronto Star reported. In July, Sylvester, a loner and recluse who a jury heard had fantasized about raping women, was sentenced to life in prison with no parole eligibility for 16 years for the second-degree murder of Ross, 25, who was his next-door neighbour in Markham, Ont.

Women Pack Bags

EDMONTON — Some 30 volunteers spent the last few weeks stuffing hundreds of backpacks for kids who live in Edmonton's women's shelters. Last year, Na'mat Canada's Edmonton chapter filled 425 packs, and this year, it hoped to fill 500, Shoshana Assaraf-Beihse, the co-ordinator of Na'amat's local School Supplies for Kids program, told the Edmonton Journal. Office Depot provided the backpacks and solicited donations of school supplies from customers. Na'amat chapters in Calgary, Winnipeg, Ottawa and southern Ontario also pack schoolbags for the program, which began in 1998.

YU Names New Dean

NEW YORK — The director of the largest U.S. rabbinical court has been named the next dean of Yeshiva University's rabbinical school. Rabbi Yona Reiss, a Yale Law School graduate who has led the Beth Din of America since 1998, will become dean of the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary on July 1, 2008. Rabbi Reiss will replace Rabbi Zevulun Charlop, who has been dean for more than 35 years.

Israelis Fight Fires

ATHENS — An Israeli delegation joined foreign firefighters helping to fight massive blazes in Greece. Fifty-one Israeli firefighters flew out Aug. 27 to Greece, where scores of people had died from forest fires that had been raging since around Aug. 23. The Israeli delegation was expected to spend several days helping local counterparts where needed. Israel acquired enhanced knowledge on fighting forest fires during last year's Lebanon war, when Hezbollah missiles set large swaths of the Galilee ablaze.

Actor Faces Boycott

CAIRO — A popular Egyptian actor faces a boycott in his homeland for appearing in a TV film about Saddam Hussein that stars an Israeli actor as the Iraqi leader. The Egyptian actor's union said it would probe whether Amr Waked violated its rules for agreeing to play Saddam's son-in-law in a BBC production now filming in Tunisia, Agence France Presse reported. Waked plays Saddam's son-in-law and Yigal Naor, an Israeli, plays Saddam. Waked, who appeared opposite George Clooney in Syriana in 2005, has been telling Egyptian newspapers he did not know of Naor's participation when he signed on and that the film is critical of U.S. Mideast policy.

Rabbi Advised Gen. Eisenhower in Europe

NEW YORK — Rabbi Judah Nadich, the longtime rabbi at the Park Avenue Synagogue-Agudat Yesharim in New York City, died Aug. 26 at age 95.

He served at the shul, one of the largest Conservative synagogues in the United States, from 1957 to 1987.

Born in Baltimore, Rabbi Nadich was ordained by the Jewish Theological Seminary of America in 1937. In 1942 he enlisted in the army as a chaplain and was sent to London, becoming the first rabbi to serve as a chaplain in the European theatre. Two years later, Rabbi Nadich was transferred to Paris, where he conducted the first post-liberation religious services for survivors and Jewish serviceman at the rue de la Victoire synagogue.

In 1945, he became the first adviser on Jewish affairs to the commander of the U.S. forces in Europe, Gen. Dwight Eisenhower. Returning to the United States, Rabbi Nadich worked as a fundraiser and spokesperson for the United Jewish Appeal and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee. After holding a post at a synagogue in Massachusetts, he became the rabbi at Park Avenue, which has 1,500 families.

Rabbi Nadich is survived by his wife of 60 years, Hadassah, as well as by three daughters, Leah, Shira and Nommi, and several grandchildren.

New group calls for faith-based funding

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A new pro-faith-based-education funding advocacy group has joined the 2007 Ontario election fray.

Last week, the Public Education Fairness Network revealed itself to the press with a news conference at a downtown hotel.

The group insists that rather than creating separate, faith pockets inside the public system, bringing faith communities into the public school system would instead allow "children… their teachers and school administrators to share their cultures through meaningful interaction."

The group is made up of high-profile members of the Jewish, Armenian, Hindu, Sikh and Muslim communities and jointly organized by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Approximately 53,000 children attend religious schools across these communities, representing about seven per cent of students attending faith-based schools in the province. The other 93 per cent, or 650,000, attend the publicly funded Catholic school system, according to the group's literature.

The group is "working to change this decades-old inequity," it said.

Representing the faith communities at the event were David Koschitzky, federation's vice-chair; Latif Mirza, secretary general of the Islamic Circle of North America; Sivan Karshafian, board member of the ARS Armenian Day School; Shahen Mirakian, a graduate of the ARS Armenian Day School; Pandit Roonpnauth Sharma, president of the Federation of Hindu Temples; Balwinder Singh, a member of the Ontario Sikh and Gurdwara Council; and federation spokesperson Howard English.

Greater Toronto Area

At the Center of it all

From the editor's desk

In the heart of Jerusalem's elegant German Colony neighbourhood, merely metres from the very pleasant yet very busy Emek Refa'im, is the Shalem Center.

The high, arched windows, the raw and the polished locally quarried stone, and the gold-beige-pink colour of the building exude Jerusalem: gravitas, strength, history and charm. It is a profoundly appropriate portal to the thinking and the writing inside the building itself.

Founded in 1994, the centre is already a highly respected institute of research and education. Its main aim, as described in its literature, is "to develop and transmit ideas in the areas most crucial to the intellectual and public life of the Jewish people."

Last week in Jerusalem, The CJN met with the centre's president, Dan Polisar, to talk about the present state of public life in Israel and the mood of the people concerning the future.

The sense of popular malaise with the institutions of the state that had set in after the conclusion of the Second Lebanon War has not yet lifted, and in any event, on the eve of Rosh Hashanah, it seemed like an appropriately reflective thing to do.

"The single most important thing to note is that Israeli society is an extraordinarily strong society," Polisar said without even a micro-second of hesitation.

The soft-spoken but unmistakably assertive Polisar emphasized this point. "Pessimism is something we need to overcome. We are a very patriotic society, extraordinarily capable of dealing with difficult challenges, whether the challenges are military, such as the Second Lebanon War, or the surprisingly high level of current diplomatic hostility to our state, or the many economic challenges. Israeli society can rise above and defeat all these challenges."

Though the diminutive scholar spoke with rock-solid confidence about the underlying strengths of Israeli society, he did not, however, avoid pointing to the problematic and painful fact that "within Israel's cultural elite, there is a stream of thought not quite sympathetic to a Jewish national state."

One of the most poignant examples, he pointed out, of an individual who advances this stream of thought is Avrum Burg. The former Labor party Knesset member, Speaker of the Knesset and head of the Jewish Agency was still much in the news for his recent shocking denunciation of the Jewish state and for his personal renunciation of Zionism as his cause.

Polisar said he is troubled by the fact that a leader of Burg's stature would declare himself "no longer a Zionist."

Dan Polisar

"When Burg says he is no longer a Zionist, that he voted in the French election and took out French citizenship, he commits a cultural defection and undergoes a change of world view of a kind unparalleled in modern democratic world.

"It needs to be understood that Burg did not appear out of nowhere. Some of Israel's scholars, such as the late Yeshayahu Leibowitz, the winner of the prestigious Israel Prize, and the renowned educator Moshe Zimmerman helped shape his views."

Thus, Polisar believes there is a heightened urgency and importance at this moment in time to the centre's mission, namely, the development of intellectual leadership committed to critical thinking but also to the idea of a Jewish state.

"The centre is interested in developing thinkers of sound ideas on Israel and on the broader Jewish world who will be able to compete in the marketplace of ideas."

In an effort to expand its ability to fulfil its mission, the centre is boldly trying to build upon its present research and education framework and also become a full-fledged, fully accredited Jewish liberal arts college. The centre is currently working closely with Israel's Council on Higher Education to meet all the necessary standards and other criteria to attain college status.

It is a natural evolution for the centre. In 2004, the centre was approached by a group of university students "who were looking for something additional to what they were getting in their classes."

"After a while," Polisar explained, "we began a pilot teaching program of short courses for these students [on subjects ranging from Jewish thought and tradition to western philosophy, archeology, military and political strategy]. As no academic credits were attached to the courses, they were learning " 'l'shma,'" that is, for its own sake.

"In the fall of 2005, we offered seven such courses. At least 50 students were enrolled in one or two courses. By the end of 2007, the end of the second full year in which the programs will have been offered, we will have 20 courses and an enrolment of 150 students."

There is clearly a rising demand for the intense, university-level learning on the core subjects that tie Jewish history, culture and tradition to that of western civilization at the Shalem Center.

"The Zionist movement is one of the greatest achievements of the 20th century," Polisar emphasized as our meeting concluded. "Especially before the Yamim Nora'im, we must be focused on the most important issues. We must get past our pessimism and realize the enormous strength of Israeli society." – MBD

UJA plans to raise campaign 'base' to $75 million

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Larry Miller is pretty much a lone voice in Hollywood when it comes to love of Israel, although more and more people are starting to come around – slowly, he says.

The actor, comedian and writer, whose numerous roles have included "the doorman" on a 1995 Seinfeld episode, told an audience of almost 1,000 people last week that he became nervous when he was approached over coffee on an "immense" sound stage at Universal Studios in 2002 by someone who said, "I just read something you wrote about Israel."

Speaking at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Community Campaign Launch 2008 at the Fairmont Royal York, Miller said that during the moment he hesitated, someone else said, "I don't have enough information to make a decision about Israel."

Instantly, Miller recovered. "Yeah, you do," he said. "I said, 'Imagine this entire stage is all the countries surrounding [Israel].' I took my cup of coffee, put it down, and said, 'That's Israel. Now you have enough information to make a decision.'"

That encounter motivated him to travel to Israel for the first time that summer, he said. "I saw [victims of terrorist attacks] there who moved me so much, because all they could do was thank me."

A passionate Israel defender, Miller told the UJA supporters, "You are no different from me, and I am no different from you, because we have decided to stand up and say, 'I am a Jew.' "

He said there are two themes that he loves for their dual meanings: "Hineni," in the sense not only of "Here I am" but "Here's where I stand;" and "Am Yisrael Chai" (the Jewish nation lives) referring to both the nation of Israel and the people of Israel.

Giving money to help Israel is a joy, not a burden, Miller said. He encouraged the audience to double their UJA pledges. "When we all have this meeting with God one day, do you really want to say, 'We really wanted to put new tiles in the pool that summer?'"

Morris Perlis, co-chair of this year's campaign with Lesley Binstock Offman, announced a "need to raise our campaign from a base of $60 million to $75 million over the next two years" because of "mounting concerns."

The 2008 campaign will focus on four areas. As listed in the evening's program, they are: "inspiring Jewish identity among our next generation; standing with Israel in a time of great need; transforming lives within our underprivileged populations; and engaging a growing and dynamic community here in Toronto."

Earlier this year, the federation committed $1 million to help the people of Sderot, the beleaguered town near Gaza that has suffered numerous Qassam rocket attacks. A portion of the money was used this summer to bus Sderot children to summer camps in safer areas, said Liora Yakubowicz, chair of Women's Campaign and Advocacy, who introduced the Sderot Youth Choir.

The choir's eight singers and one guitarist, ranging in age from 14 to 19, received a standing ovation for their mix of familiar and more intense versions of tunes like Yerushalayim Shel Zahav and Hinei Matov. They also sang the poignant Shir L'Shalom (Song of Peace) that former Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin sang in 1995 before he was assassinated at a Tel Aviv peace rally.

The Campaign
for Our Jewish Future
...now, when?

Actor and comedian Larry Miller makes a point during his keynote speech at last week's UJA Federation campaign launch.

Choir members' origins range from native Israelis to the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia. It was their first time in Canada and, for some, their first time outside of Israel.

Along with brief remarks by launch chairs Lynn Belzberg and Dale Lastman, David Koschitzky, vice-chair of UJA, gave an impassioned speech about the fight for public funding for faith-based schools.

He also thanked the choir for "reflecting the true spirit of Israel. Despite the tensions they face daily, you see the power of optimism and joy, and that is what makes Israel such a remarkable country."

Koschitzky said education funding is "an issue of paramount importance." The cost of tuition has reached a point where day school education is beyond the reach of even upper middle class Jewish families, he said.

"Today, in Ontario, public education funds 650,000 children who attend within a faith-based Catholic system, but 53,000 in other faith-based schools including Jewish day schools are not part of the publicly funded education system," Koschitzky said. "Simply put, we believe the status quo is unfair and indefensible."

Among other benefits, inclusive public education would ensure that all faith-based schools are accountable for what they teach and that they are consistent with Canadian values and provincial standards, he noted.

He urged audience members to make their voices heard in the Oct. 10 provincial election and, more immediately, by writing letters to the editor, challenging incorrect statements and engaging politicians who are campaigning.

John Tory, leader of the Ontario Progressive Conservative party, who supports public funding for faith-based schools, was at the launch and received prolonged applause when his presence was announced.

McGuinty urged to retract 'hurtful' remarks

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Jewish groups are calling on Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty to retract his suggestion that the public education system in Ontario would suffer if it were to fund all faith-based schools.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region (CJCONT) issued a press release last week that urged McGuinty to reconsider the idea that funding Jewish private schools, as well as other faith-based private schools, would lead to the "unravelling of social cohesion."

In the release, UJA Federation chair David Engel said that faith-based communities are deeply offended by his remarks.

"Our schools teach respect for all members of Ontario society – not the opposite – and we encourage our students to strengthen the society around us through their volunteer work and their careers," Engel said.

CJCONT chair Frank Bialystock also challenged McGuinty's stance by pointing out that thousands of graduates from faith-based schools contribute to Canadian society.

"The suggestion that our schools are in any way divisive or segregationist is hurtful," Bialystock said.

Ted Sokolsky, UJA Federation president and CEO, said that they felt they had "no choice but to issue this public appeal" because they grew tired of waiting for McGuinty to reconsider his position.

UJA and CJCONT reported that since the premier made his remarks on August 22, they have received many complaints from the Jewish community, which have been forwarded to the premier's office.

"Regardless of how one feels about the issue of inclusive public education, the debate should be conducted in an atmosphere of mutual respect, without casting aspersions on faith communities," Sokolsky said.

New trade official wants Israel on Canada's radar

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In the world of international trade, every country possesses some kind of competitive advantage. Even a country as tiny as Israel, population seven million, has something that G-8 member Canada, population 32 million, wants and can use.

Getting Canadian businesses to recognize Israel as an investment opportunity or trading partner is the task assigned to Israeli trade commissioners, and Jonathan Levy is the latest to hold that title, having taken over from the departed Ephraim Shoham.

On the job for only a few weeks, Levy comes with substantial knowledge of the Canadian business scene, and he believes there is plenty of room to grow the two countries' trade relationship.

Currently two way trade stands at more than $1 billion, and financial investments (such as Israeli purchases of Canadian real estate) add another $1 billion or more.

Nevertheless, Levy said, "we see that Canada has been off the radar of Israel for a long time, and the same goes in the other direction."

Israel is a major player in various high-tech domains and has particular expertise in turning good ideas into commercial products. Canadian companies, he said, face the "challenge of commercializing their research and development and turning research into a viable product. I think this is an area where co-operation with Israeli researchers can be of huge benefit."

Jonathan Levy

Levy, 37, comes to his new posting in Toronto with 13 years experience in the Israeli foreign economic service. With degrees in business administration and law, he served as the official responsible for central and eastern Europe under then-trade minister Ehud Olmert. He served as economic attache in Vienna for four years and more recently as director of the ministry's North American division.

Speaking in his office at the Israeli Consulate, Levy said with its small domestic market, Israeli firms have been forced to look abroad to market the products its scientific and academic community develop.

Israeli businesses "are quite experienced doing business overseas" while the government has created the infrastructure to support that endeavour by signing free trade agreements with Canada, the United States, the European Union and Mexico. "I think a partnership between Canadian companies can be useful in penetrating third countries, like in Europe," he said.

Israel is advanced in information technology, environmental technology (such as "green tech," "clean tech" and water purification), domestic security, life sciences (including stem cell research) and computers. Israel's leadership in the computer realm has been recognized by major players such as Intel, which developed its Pentium IV and Centrino chips there, and Microsoft, which is expanding its operations in Israel to employ more than 500 people.

Giving the Israeli business scene even more credibility were two deals announced last year. Renowned American investor Warren Buffett announced that the company he controls, Berkshire Hathaway, was acquiring 80 per cent of Israeli cutting tools company Iscar Metalworking for $4 billion (US). A few months later, Hewlett-Packard acquired software developer Mercury Interactive in a $4.4-billion deal.

Those deals substantiate the high marks given to the Israeli economy by ratings companies such as Moody's, S&P and Finch, Levy said, adding that Israel's GDP growth (last year around 6.6 per cent) is above the world average and was barely affected by last year's war with Hezbollah.

As trade commissioner, it's his job to bring Canadian and Israelis companies together, to act as a business "matchmaker."

A native of Jerusalem, Levy sees it as a Zionist mission to improve Israel's economic situation and make it stronger in that strategic sense. He also loves being on the ground floor to witness business deals being made, as well as how investors decide where to put their money and how the business world and the political realm interact.

The son of an academic who took sabbaticals in the eastern United States, Levy grew up speaking English even before he could speak Hebrew. Returning to North America with his wife, Shelly, and three young children, is like coming full circle, he said.

"For me, it's very important to make a difference, to provide added value to businessmen and companies in both Canada and Israel," he added.

Woman sues rabbi, Beth Tzedec over alleged sexual assault

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Beth Tzedec Congregation and one of its rabbis are being sued for more than $1.3 million in connection with alleged "sexual and emotional assaults" on a student studying to be a shamash.

Legal documents have been filed in Ontario Superior Court alleging Rabbi Tobias Gabriel used his position of authority to coerce a sexual relationship with Yona Nadler, one of seven students studying in the Rabbinic Assembly's Shamashim program. The course for Conservative synagogue beadles (an attendant, caretaker or custodian) was offered last summer at Beth Tzedec, and Rabbi Gabriel was one of the instructors. Nadler was the only woman in the program.

The statement of claim alleges Nadler, 52, and Rabbi Gabriel began a sexual relationship after the program concluded.

Simona Jellinek, the lawyer representing Nadler, said Rabbi Gabriel and the Beth Tzedec were in a "fiduciary" relationship to Nadler – one based on trust and confidence – similar to that between a doctor and a patient or a clergyman and a person of faith. As a respected religious authority, Rabbi Gabriel "made advances and planted seeds of doubt about [Nadler's] marriage.

"He was trying to take advantage, telling her it's okay to love two men," Jellinek said. "A rabbi has, to certain extent, control over her religious life," in this case by being in a position to help her continue her career, she stated.

"What happened here happens frequently with people in positions of power who are able to convince people over whom they have power to do what they want."

The statement of claim alleges, "The sexual assaults and battery by [Rabbi] Gabriel occurred while Yona was in [Rabbi] Gabriel's care or under his control. Yona states that [Rabbi] Gabriel was her caretaker when the sexual assaults and battery occurred and that he was an authority figure and confidant to Yona. Yona states that [Rabbi] Gabriel knew or ought to have known that Yona would rely on him as an authority figure to give advice to her, to guide her and to protect her from harm."

Their sexual relationship ended after a couple of months when Nadler's husband learned of it.

Beth Tzedec, Jellinek said, bears responsibility, as it employed Rabbi Gabriel and knew about the rabbi's alleged earlier sexual liaison with a congregant who was grieving the loss of a parent. The synagogue did not ensure the safety of Nadler and others and did not adequately supervise Rabbi Gabriel, the statement of claim asserts.

Beth Tzedec's lawyer did not return The CJN's calls, though Alf Kwinter, who represents Rabbi Gabriel, said his client "is going to challenge the allegations."

Rabbi Gabriel "has an exemplary record at the Beth Tzedec," Kwinter said. "Nobody would stay at the Beth Tzedec for 13 years if they weren't an exemplary performer."

Asked how Rabbi Gabriel reacted to the court claim, Kwinter said, "I think it's a terribly tragic situation for everybody. He's terribly upset about it, as is his family. Ultimately, he wants to clear his name."

Kwinter criticized the synagogue for publishing a letter about the allegations to its congregation: "I thought the letter was improper and should not have been sent… I thought the letter was not prudent."

He speculated that the executive distributed it because they did not want the congregation to learn about the allegations in the media.

In a letter to members distributed last week, Shep Gangbar, the congregation's president, noted allegations of "impropriety and abuse" stemming from an "inappropriate relationship between Rabbi Gabriel and a married adult woman who is not a congregant… Unfortunately, there is little doubt that the impropriety occurred."

The letter, however, does not specify the nature of the impropriety or the abuse.

The letter went on to distance the synagogue from the allegations, saying "it is not liable for the actions of Rabbi Gabriel," and it noted that the rabbi would no longer be involved with the synagogue in any capacity.

Far below basic humanitarian standards

Michael Williams, the British diplomat, recently completed his term as the United Nations envoy for the Middle East peace process. Apparently, his last conversation in the region was with Karni Goldwasser, the wife of abducted Israeli soldier, Ehud Goldwasser. It could not have been a conversation of hope or optimism.

Williams has utterly failed in helping secure the release of Goldwasser and fellow soldier Eldad Regev, who have been held captive by Hezbollah since July 12, 2006. Indeed, he has utterly failed even in securing any information about the two men's condition. But it has not been for lack of effort on Williams' part.

As he explained to the UN Security Council last week, "I have to say with deep regret personally – because I have made very considerable efforts in this regard – that more than 13 months after their abductions, we still cannot establish proof of life. I don't even say release and repatriation of the prisoners. I say proof of life."

His final presentation to the Security Council was an ironic, sadly Orwellian act that was fecund with futility. He pleaded with the leaders who have ties to Hezbollah to "urge the group to meet the basic humanitarian standards – that proof of life of prisoners should always be presented."

But putting the words "basic humanitarian standards" and "Hezbollah" in the same sentence is a repugnant bipolarity that cannot coexist in the conscience of decent humanity. The leaders of Hezbollah scoff at the misery they manufacture and manipulate.

An internal Israeli probe many weeks ago concluded that Goldwasser and Regev were seriously wounded during their capture and at least one of them may no longer be alive. The cynical refusal by Hezbollah leaders to shed any light on the status of the Israelis they stole from their families bespeaks the darkness that inhabits the Hezbollah soul.

Williams' pointed plea came the same week that the parents of Gilad Shalit, the Israeli soldier kidnapped by Hamas on June 26 last year, publicly and achingly celebrated their son's 21st birthday – his second as a prisoner of Hamas.

"Gilad Shalit, we're waiting at home for you," was the tearful rallying cry among the hundreds of Israelis who gathered in Rabin Square in Tel Aviv. They directed their cries as much to the government of Israel as to Gilad's malevolent captors.

"We are marshalling all our forces and continuing to act," Gilad's father Noam told the crowd. "We do not despair and will not give up." Then, in the way that only a father can speak to his child and to his own heart, he said: "I want to tell Gilad, 'Be strong, don't lose hope. Hope is all you have. We are not giving up in our efforts. We hope you'll celebrate your next birthday at home with your family and friends.'"

He would, as indeed would Goldwasser and Regev, if their kidnappers met basic humanitarian standards.

But they don't. They fall far below.

Affronted by premier's statement

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty's statement that funding faith-based education with public monies will "unravel social cohesion" is shocking and foments unwarranted fear. Has his own Catholic public education and those of 600,000 students now in Catholic schools led to the undermining of good citizenship and the disruption of social unity? The negative answer to this question reveals the very strength of an inclusive public education system that should and must include all faith-based schools as a matter of equality.

The premier's comment is an affront to fair-minded Catholics and a majority of Ontarians, and especially to disenfranchised families who send 53,000 children to other faith-based schools. These same families support Ontario's public education system and contribute significantly to the well-being and strength of our society. It is unfortunate McGuinty does not acknowledge these important contributions and tackle directly the unfairness of the status quo. His preferred approach to invoke fear is irresponsible and offensive.

Funding issues of faith-based schools

A. Margel's suggestion to not fund Jewish schools because of the potential for home-grown fanatics to be produced at public expense is insulting to Jewish and other faith-based schools ("Improve supplementary schools," CJN letter, Aug. 30). There is no evidence whatsoever that funding faith-based schools in Ontario (Catholic) and in other provinces (Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Quebec) has resulted in any problems of this nature. The opposite is true. Jewish schools, for example, are consistently praised for their high standards and should have little problem meeting the proposed criteria by the Conservatives to be eligible for funding, provided the Conservatives win the Oct. 10 Provincial election.

There is a concern, however, that not everyone fully understands the different provincial party positions on this issue and the significant impact that this funding will have on our schools, if the Progressive Conservatives win the election. To address this, there is an emergency community mobilization meeting on Sept. 9, at 7 p.m. at Bais Yaakov Elementary School. I would urge Margel and all readers to attend this event and become fully informed on this issue of funding faith-based schools, which is so critical to our community and has become such a major issue in this election.

Watering down reality of anti-Semitism

Jack Chivo is wrong when he downplays the extent of Israel's involvement in the arms trade ("Applying 'double standards' to Israel," CJN letter, Aug. 23). Israel is in the top 10 of the world's arms suppliers. These arms cannot be said to only go to decent, democratic nations. It is not anti-Semitic to point this out.

Rather, it is a denial of basic human rights when we obsess only with stateless terror organizations and forget about the significant role in warfare played by so-called decent nations. As a Jew, I consider much of the arms industry obscene, whether it is owned by Israelis, Germans, French or Americans.

Chivo should be more careful about where he aims his criticism. It only serves to water down the reality of true anti-Semitism when thoughtful Jews are accused along with people who really do have a deep antipathy toward all Jews.

Group wants to debate boycott on campus

Neither I nor the Queen's Coalition Against Racial and Ethnic Discrimination (QCRED), of which I am a member, have stated that we are in support of the boycott proposal that is currently under debate in the British University and College Union ("Queen group backs boycott," CJN, Aug. 23). We have asked for an open debate on campus to discuss these issues. We have stated, as your article suggested correctly, that we believe that Karen Hitchcock, principal of Queen's University, should be concerned about violations of academic freedom of Palestinian groups, too. QCRED also has taken issue with Hitchcock's statement of July 6, "denouncing a May decision by the British University and College Union (UCU) to hold a union-wide debate on whether to boycott Israeli academia" [a quote from the CJN article], because it was made unilaterally without observing the proper protocols of university governance, pre-empts discussion by the appropriate faculty and student organizations, and, perhaps most importantly, threatens to have Queen's boycotted by British academics without the consent of the campus community.

Darfurians present a dilemma for Israel

By YONATAN GLASER

I missed Ismail at synagogue last night. This intelligent, thoughtful man, a refugee from Darfur, who at the time had been in Israel for less than 20 days, had joined me the previous Friday night for services. At the end of the service, he spoke to the community. After a slightly nervous start, he told his story to the 300 assembled people, a tale of many bullets, three countries, two jail arrests, fear and death.

They were dumbstruck to hear what I knew to be only a small part of his and his family's harrowing and dangerous journey, one that had led him to be there that night. At that point, Ismail, his wife and four children (aged one, three, five and 15) had been living with my family in our Jerusalem home for a week.

That morning, our photo and a detailed story had appeared on the front page of the national newspaper Ha'aretz. What had previously felt to my family to be simply a Jewish, moral, and Zionist thing to do – to help a refugee family – had been portrayed as an act of great exception. It was one of many interviews and a TV appearance.

Then, in the middle of the next week, the family moved to Tel Aviv, where Ismail began work at a restaurant. He is a computer technician and network administrator – better trained than most of his peers and with excellent English – so I doubt it will be long before he moves into his chosen profession. When I visited them the following night to see their rented apartment, he pointed out an empty shop front he had set his eye on, from which he hopes to start repairing computers, as he had done in Cairo. While I miss the intense experience of their company, I am glad they have moved on.

But the stories of Ismail and the 1,400 or so other Sudanese refugees in Israel have only just begun, and Israeli society must contend with this new situation. For now, the refugees are being hosted in private homes, living temporarily on kibbutzim, staffing hotels bursting with summer holiday makers and, perhaps surprisingly, living in Ketziot, Israel's high security jail for Palestinian security prisoners. But then what? Nobody knows quite what to do.

'It is here and now. It is not in heaven.'

Only if we get our arms around this challenge in real time will we be able to handle this burgeoning crisis in the humane and moral tradition on which our deepest values rest. Before serious mistakes are made and long-lasting regrets created, several leading Israeli nonprofit organizations have created the Coalition for Refugees from Darfur and Sudan to co-ordinate their direct activities and to prompt the government to act.

Ismail was born in a small village in Darfur, the region where the "Fur" kingdom existed until 100 years ago ("Dar" means "kingdom" and "Fur" is the name of the group of African tribes that made up the kingdom). Over the years, Western intervention was followed by Arab and Islamic efforts to ethnically "cleanse" the area of the Darfurians, who are neither Arab nor Muslim.

Forty years ago, Ismail's family lived on the family plot growing agricultural produce. In his late teens, he went to Khartoum, the capital city, to learn English. It was then that the attacks by the Janjaweed, Sudanese government-backed militias, began. This escalated in 2002 with murderous attacks amounting to outright genocide.

Following many atrocities and family tragedies, Ismail and his family fled to Cairo, where they were given refugee status. Initially things were bearable, but the situation of Sudanese refugees in Cairo became shockingly bad: they have no access to health or education services and were randomly beaten and arrested on the street.

According to Amnesty International, a protest against this situation in 2005 led to some 30 refugees being shot dead by the authorities. Ismail was arrested and jailed. On his release, he realized he had to do something. That led him to recently pay Bedouin smugglers to smuggle the family to the border with Israel and, after short stops in Be'er Sheva and then Jerusalem's Rose Garden opposite the Knesset, they were the family we decided to host to save them from being "relocated" to the Ketziot prison in the Negev desert.

As our family sat around our lounge discussing this decision, we wondered whether the yet-unknown family would be with us forever. We decided that two weeks was our limit. But what if the government hadn't made any progress? Would we take them back to the Rose Garden and say, "It was nice, but that's all we can do?"

It was clear that we would not.

The emotional, moral and practical territory we decided to chart was to do every single thing that we felt we could do, and to trust that our friends, the organizations involved and the government would rise to the challenge so that we would not face that unthinkable situation. By reaching out to our networks and working closely with the organizations, we proved to be right. We feel this is a microcosm of what Israel must do: to do everything it can and rely on the world community to do its part, too. If we think in terms of "all or nothing," we paralyze ourselves into inaction.

So far, the government has been slow to react. Perhaps fearful of Israel being overrun at the barely fenced border between Israel and Egypt, the government's response to date has been to let citizens look after the refugees.

Recently, new arrivals coming over the border have been sent to jail. I visited these refugees in jail last month as part of the coalition delegation. While the 52 women and children were being looked after relatively well, the 200 men are in the regular prison facility and having a very hard time. But they should not be in jail at all. The government has not decided whether any of the refugees will be given some sort of permanent status in Israel. Some ministers have said the current status quo is just "until they are all returned." That makes us very, very concerned.

So while Ismail is managing, he and the other refugees are still in a complete twilight zone. Our coalition is working hard to achieve three goals:

- Advance Israeli NGO efforts to directly help the 1,400-plus Darfur and Sudanese refugees who have entered Israel (and those who are still coming over the border) receive proper treatment, have their rights protected and find short- and long-term solutions for health, housing, work and childcare/education needs.
- Urge the Israeli government to develop policy and take action on a range of short- and long-term issues, including but not limited to establishing facilities and services to help refugees; developing and implementing a border protection policy and a refugee absorption policy; taking part in international efforts to end the violence in Africa and advocating for protection of refugees there. We will develop and advocate for specific policies as needed.
- Develop an Israeli and international Jewish humanitarian response to the plight of African refugees, including the creation of a facility managed by Israelis and international Jewish groups for 1,000 refugees in a friendly African country that partners with Israeli and Jewish volunteers.

In Israel, we are actively seeking volunteers, donations and more organizations to join the coalition. In North America, we seek the involvement of those who wish to help us carry out goal No. 1, lend their weight to help convince the government to fulfill goal No. 2, and partner with us to fulfil a basic Jewish responsibility – as the Jewish people – in fulfilling goal No. 3. We have begun discussions with major American organizations working on this issue.

When asked by a reporter how I rate my government, I said the jury was still out. This could turn into a huge violation of human rights and of the 1951 international treaty on refugees that Israel not only signed but was instrumental in creating. This would be a source of heartache and guilt for generations. Or we can rise to the occasion with mindfulness, compassion and resolve. When our children and grandchildren come to us in the future, as they will, and ask "What did you do for the Sudanese refugees and to stop the genocide in Africa? " will we be proud of the story we have to tell?

My own family narrowly escaped from Vienna when, in 1938, the Nazis came over the border into Austria. Months earlier, prior to my grandfather applying for papers to immigrate to Australia, he had sent a letter to long-lost Uncle Borer asking him to make the mandatory declaration of taking responsibility for the family. Little did my grandfather know that when he wrote to Uncle Borer, he actually sent it (not knowing any English) to the Borer and White Ant Extermination Company. The company owner and friends decided to sponsor my grandparents and then seven-year old father out to Australia. They wrote back as if they were Uncle Borer. Until the moment my grandparents and father arrived, they expected to meet Uncle Borer at the wharf.

Today, we Jews, in Israel and elsewhere, are challenged to decide: do we take responsibility for people in desperate need only if they are part of our Jewish family, or will we break the barriers of psychology, comfort and habit to include others in the human race? We must now embody what we constantly tell ourselves we believe: that all humanity is one family; that to save one life is to save a whole world; and that we truly mean it when we say, "Never again."

It is here and now. It is not in heaven.

Freedom withheld

Unbeknownst to me, my last column foreshadowed a recent experience. I wrote about freedom being neither easy nor free without any specific international application in mind. Neither did I have any real thoughts about my immediate plans. Grateful for our freedoms, I was more concerned and aware of their costs than mindful of their absence.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Yet, I was about to embark on a search for my own roots to countries where freedom was not a manifest experience. In the past month, I travelled to the Czech Republic, Austria, Hungary and Romania, four countries whose recent past did not include some of the freedoms to which I referred. I was on a search for my own Jewish roots, and while I found out much about the Jewish past, I also got a taste of eastern Europe's struggle with ideas and ideals of freedom.

I am not claiming any expertise, just a feeling about the overwhelming importance of freedom and the long shadow cast by its absence. Being unable to make certain decisions, to publicly speak out, to make choices, to travel and migrate – all these restrictions over a long period create an isolated and confined community. People can become solemn and constrained. A lack of freedom limits creativity and imagination, compromises life and culture, and creates closed societies.

The countries I visited are vibrant and vibrating. They are building on a long cultural heritage of great creativity and historical significance. They must overcome years of debilitating coercion and control. It's exciting to read of their growth and worrisome to hear of their troubles. Communist regimes took their tolls in human and cultural assets.

I can't explain why on this recent trip I was unprepared for this "lesson." I surely knew the facts of history. But it is perhaps much more impressive to visit the places and learn experientially: seeing people, hearing stories and trying to understand.

I remember being overwhelmed with freedom sensibilities when I cam home from a trip to Russia in 1981. I was away for two weeks, during which I felt severely deprived. I was followed and suspected. I was detained and questioned.

I went to talk with and teach Jews, knowing that any action placed us all in danger. When I got off the plane in Canada, I was so relieved (and also guilty). Two weeks was too much for me, but the refuseniks remained. I was so happy to be here, I could almost taste freedom.

So while freedom is not free – it is complex and demanding – its antithesis is surely not desirable.

A free and open society has many problems. It's not easy, but it beats the alternative!

I wish you all a good New Year, one full of health, joy and responsible freedom.

Let's keep our church-state balance

"We in the West find it incomprehensible that theological ideas still inflame the minds of men, stirring up messianic passions that can leave societies in ruin. We had assumed that this was no longer possible, that human beings had learned to separate religious questions from political ones, that political theology died in 16th century Europe. We were wrong. It's we who are the exception."

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Setting aside the supercilious tone of this statement by Mark Lilla in the Aug. 19 New York Times Magazine, I wonder where this writer got the idea that everyone in "the West" has not realized, for some time now, that what he calls "political theology" is alive and kicking? Certainly not from paying attention to the quasi-religions that bedevilled the 20th century, among them Communism and Nazism – or did just the Jews notice? – and certainly not from even a cursory understanding of Israel, Turkey and India, just to mention three, where whole political parties were founded on the notion that religion and the state are, or should be, one.

I will not bother with the rest of the article's argument. It is inescapably clear that the actions of mankind are influenced, for evil as well as good, by theological constraints. We may call them fanatics, but they not only inhabit the edges, they are an integral part of the mainstream in country after country. Why has it taken so long for Lilla to figure this out?

Stepping away from the Arab-Israeli conflict and the bombers of 9/11, has the copious bloodletting between India and Pakistan since 1948 not illustrated that Gandhi's dream of a secular state died with partition?

Have we not seen in the United States a born-again president inflict his brand of Christianity on the state, deflecting needed monies to "faith-based" agencies, and denying funding to stem-cell research while withholding information about birth control and AIDS prevention from desperate African nations?

And what of our own Stephen Harper? On Aug. 18, the Vancouver Sun described the prime minister's association with the Christian and Missionary Alliance church, a longtime opponent of liberal heresies such as abortion and the right of divorced couples to remarry. The church supported Harper's cancellation of a national daycare program, which he replaced with a totally inadequate subsidy to all parent households, scuttling plans for more affordable daycare centres. Never mind that the money will in no way help a poor family put its children in a licensed daycare so they can work. Better welfare than daycare, it seems.

Fortunately, Canadian pundits such as David Frum have left for the United States and left us with a healthy distrust of religion in the state capital.

But religion, in all its glory and shame, has never been out of the minds of nation-builders. It's true that some democracies have managed to erect walls against excess. And it's true that western thinkers have been very, very, very slow to realize this unique character of civil society and the potentially destructive power of "political theology."

That religion in politics is a surprise all of a sudden – now that's scary.

When writing my master's thesis in history, I discovered this blindness first hand. My adviser, a fine scholar, wasn't interested in the inclusion of religious motivations in my study of Holocaust survivors. As a labour historian, he was looking for Economic Man in the account, not Religious Man. Thus he and so many others are no doubt shocked by the efflorescence of religious hatred that has bloomed in the 21st century.

He, like so many others, understood little of religion and its indelible mark on the human psyche. He, and many others, have remained blind as religious passion has swept across the front pages of the press.

Yet, Canada and the United States are not the same. Harper will not suddenly whip off a mask to reveal George Bush III. We have struggled to maintain our own civil psyches. After much trial, pain and suffering for aboriginal peoples, Jews fleeing Hitler, and other maligned populations, Canada has developed safeguards to protect and maintain communal religious practice and, at the same time, a public, civil society.

Let's keep it that way.

Women of valour

The term "woman of valour" is an English translation of the Hebrew phrase "aishet chayil," referred to in Proverbs 31:10-31. The verses of the poem are traditionally recited or sung by a man to his wife on Shabbat to show how much he loves her and appreciates all that she does. More generically, however, the phrase represents an expression of honour for all Jewish women and their dedication to their families and communities.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

On Sept. 9, Emunah Women and Na'amat Canada are recognizing and celebrating women of valour of various faith backgrounds who have distinguished themselves in local, provincial and national communities. Proceeds from this event will go to the Na'amat Canada Glickman Centre for Family Violence Prevention in Tel Aviv, and to Emunah's Neve Michael Children's Village in Pardes Chana, as well as locally to support Edmonton-area women's shelters and Na'amat School Supplies for Kids.

The six women to be honoured are Marie Stelmach, Lynn Mandel, Anne McLellan, Shoshanna Pollack, Miriam Ghermezian and Indira Samarasekera. Each has demonstrated the qualities of an aishet chayil, a woman who is noble, forceful, mighty and valiant.

Consider the achievements of the six honorees. Miriam Ghermezian, the matriarch of a prominent Edmonton family, grew up in Iran, where she devoted herself to her family and community. She provided food and other necessities to needy Jewish families and children at a time of deteriorating conditions for Iran's Jewish community. For decades of Canadian life, she has been an inspiration for her family, who continue to follow her example of community service.

Lynn Mandel, an accomplished dancer, has been both a performer and a dance instructor. Mandel, who is married to Edmonton Mayor Stephen Mandel, established two ballet schools, and over the years, has served as a member of the boards of directors of several prominent artistic organizations. Her dedication to community has not been restricted to the performing arts, as she has also volunteered for various health-related agencies.

Anne McLellan has held several portfolios as a federal cabinet minister, including minister of justice, attorney general, and minister of public safety and emergency preparedness. She has also served as deputy prime minister of Canada. Since leaving public office, she has been recognized as a distinguished scholar and was the recipient of an honorary doctorate from the University of Alberta.

Shoshana Pollack served as a director of Artists House and the Bezalel National Museum, precursor of the Israel Museum, in Jerusalem. After moving to Canada, she distinguished herself through her work in many organizations, both within the Jewish community and in the community at large. This has included contributions to the Kids with Cancer organization, relief work for women and children in Rwanda, and service through the Rotary Club, Na'amat and Emunah Women of Canada.

Indira Samarasekera, a distinguished scholar and educator, is currently the president of the University of Alberta. She is a member of two prime minister's advisory committees and also serves in several organizations related to national public policy and advanced education, including the National Research Council of Canada. In recognition of her public service, she was appointed an officer of the Order of Canada.

Marie Stelmach has contributed to various local and province-wide public service organizations, including the Alberta Hospital Edmonton and Community Mental Health Foundation, the Children's Cottage Society of Calgary, the Girl Guides of Canada Alberta Council, the Glenrose Rehabilitation Hospital Foundation and many others designed to improve the lives and well-being of Albertans. She is married to Alberta Premier Ed Stelmach.

It is obvious that all of these honorees are women of valour, individuals who have exemplified the spirit of aishet chayil. They have given their time, expertise and commitment to serve their communities and those in need. In aspiring to achieve tikkun olam (repairing the world), they are role models for all of us who desire a better world, a world of compassion and caring. And they are members of a remarkable sisterhood of valour.

We rejoice in and celebrate the accomplishments of these individuals, and it is fitting that our community recognizes the many contributions of these six dedicated women. They are indeed noble, forceful, mighty and valiant individuals and they deserve our congratulations.

The Kirshner File

Eilat's magnificent coral reefs endangered

David Zakai, a Red Sea marine biologist with the Israel Nature & Parks Protection Authority, was holding forth on one of his favourite subjects as the motorized boat we were in cut a swath across the incredibly blue waters of the Gulf of Eilat (Aqaba) on a typically hot, sunny summer day. "The coral reefs in Eilat are a national treasure," he said above the din of the screaming engine. "They are among the most spectacular in the world."

Sheldon Kirshner in Israel

Universally recognized for their extraordinary beauty, complexity and biodiversity, the coral reefs of Eilat are not only a wonder of nature but a great tourist draw and, therefore, an invaluable boost to the local economy.

Yet in the last few decades, the coral reefs, covering seven kilometres of Eilat's 12 kilometre shoreline, have been in a state of precipitous decline. Due to intensive development, the careless discharge of sewage and sloppiness on the part of divers, they have radically decreased in size, leaving Eilat with only a memory of what could have been had tighter environmental controls been in place.

"The coral reefs have been severely damaged and exist in a critical stage," said Zakai, an intense man who cares deeply about their well-being. Doron Heller, the manger of Eilat's marina and a resident of the city since 1982, said that most of the reefs have been destroyed due to negligence and indifference.

Yariv Abramovich, the managing director of Zalul, an Israeli non-governmental organization dedicated to protecting Israel's water resources, confirmed Heller's claim. "Our surveys indicate that 70 per cent of the coral reefs have already died. They used to be one of the most famous symbols of Israel."

Constituting the northernmost extension of the Red Sea's 4,500-kilometre archipelago of coral reefs, they are a breeding ground for hundreds of species of immensely beautiful tropical fish.

Coral reefs, which thrive in the clear, warm waters of the Red Sea and need centuries to grow, provide nourishment and shelter for a profusion of sea creatures. "When a coral reef dies, everything else around it, including the fish, dies," said Zakai, explaining the magnitude of the problem.

Normally, snorkelling is the optimal way of exploring a coral reef. The Coral Beach Reserve, located eight kilometres south of Eilat and lying close to the Egyptian border town of Taba, attracts hordes of snorkellers from Israel and abroad. Twenty metres from the shore and 1,200 metres in length, the coral reef here contains more than 100 types of coral and 650 species of fish. If you're a snorkeller, you're in for a treat. But if, like me, you are not a snorkeller, there is no reason to fret.

The highlight of the reserve, Coral World, enables landlubbers to view a segment of the coral reef from an underwater observatory 100 metres from the shore. Resting at a depth of five metres, the observatory provides a visitor with an awe-inspiring experience. Ranging in type from brain to flower corals, the coral reef is intricate in design and fantastical in colour. The fish, from Coral Groupers to Sergeant Majors, are dazzling in their rainbow of hues.

Yet these are not the sole creatures of the deep supported by the network of coral reefs in the Gulf of Eilat – which is 180 kilometres long, very steep sided and reaches a depth of more than 1,800 metres on its east coast. At Coral World, the aquariums and pools house sharks, sting rays, sea turtles and so on, reflecting the diversity of the Gulf of Eilat's waters.

The corals at Coral World

And if a slight digression can be permitted, the views of the craggy mountains on the Israeli and Jordanian sides of the gulf are simply stunning.

These unforgettable vistas can be misleading. According to Zakai, the Gulf of Eilat is particularly vulnerable to pollution, since it is a semi-enclosed basin affected by northern prevailing winds and currents. Add to that the fact that Eilat and its neighbouring Jordanian city, Aqaba, have gone through rapid urban development in the past 30 years.

A free trade zone since 1985, Eilat was a port during the era of King Solomon. During the Hellenistic period, Eilat was a centre of the Nabatean spice trade. Under Muslim rule, pilgrims from Cairo and Damascus stopped in Eilat before setting off to Mecca for the annual haj. In the 10th century, the Crusaders conquered Eilat. Subsequently a sleepy redoubt of the Ottoman Empire, Eilat sank into obscurity in the 19th century, when steamships filled with Muslim pilgrims bypassed it en route to Mecca. During the British Mandate, Eilat, known as Umm Rashrash in Arabic, was all but forgotten, consisting of little more than a solitary police station.

David Zakai

Attached to a foreseen Jewish state under the 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan, Eilat was captured by Israeli forces in 1949 during the War of Independence. With Israeli statehood, Eilat became Israel's only port on the Red Sea, its strategic outlet to markets in Africa and Asia once Egypt denied passage to Israeli vessels through the Suez Canal. Egypt's closure of the Straits of Tiran to Israeli shipping in 1967, which effectively closed Eilat, was one of the causes of the Six Day War. Since then, Eilat has grown by leaps and bounds, despite the bankruptcy of the nearby Timna copper mines.

The Israeli government, hoping to turn Eilat into a first-class resort, paid attention to the coral reefs crowning the shoreline. In 1956, a warden was appointed to protect them, and three years later, the commercial collection of corals was banned. Environmentalists were also pleased by the establishment of the first of what was promised to be several marine reserves.

Heller, the marina manager, claims that the destruction of the coral reefs began in earnest in 1982. Israel, in keeping with its 1979 peace agreement with Egypt, made its first phased withdrawal from the Sinai Peninsula, bringing increased numbers of Israeli tourists to Eilat and prompting developers to build more hotels.

Heller, who lived in the Sinai before settling in Eilat, admitted that boat owners contributed to the degradation of the coral reef by dumping ballast and bilge water. "There were insufficient controls," he said. But in the past five years, he added, pumping equipment purchased in the United States has funnelled wastewater in the marina to a nearby treatment plant.

Doron Heller, manager of the marina

Oil spills tarnished the coral reefs in the 1970s, but this is no longer a problem thanks to the creation of a Pollution Prevention Control Station, said Zakai. Phosphate dust from tankers also damaged the coral reefs, but as far as Zakai is concerned, this problem has been solved by detection sensors. Until about 1995, Eilat's sewage continued to flow into the sea, but the construction of a treatment plant has eliminated that problem.

Fish farms, which produce 3,000 tons of fish, mainly for the Israeli market, have been a major polluter, spewing out unregulated mariculture effluent. But thanks to lobbying efforts by Zalul, the fish cages are expected to be removed next June and placed in ponds on land, said Sagit Rogenstein, a Zalul spokesperson.

Despite these improvements, the coral reefs remain imperilled. The release of brine from Eilat's desalination plant is a source of possible danger, and the proximity of hotels on the north shore interferes with winds and thus affects water currents. As well, Zakai fears that the planned conversion of the naval port into a civilian marina will exacerbate the situation. He feels that limits should be placed on snorkellers, who have broken off bits of coral.

In addition, Zakai warned that a multi-billion dollar proposal to build a canal from the Red Sea to the Dead Sea – a project promoted by Israeli President Shimon Peres to save the Dead Sea from drying up – could have catastrophic consequences. Abramovich thinks that Zakai's apprehensions may be misplaced. But he, too, is watching developments carefully, eager to save the coral reefs from extinction.

Faith-based education funding a 'defining' election issue

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The CJN opens its coverage of the upcoming 2007 Ontario election by focusing on the faith-based education funding issue and where the major parties stand.

Commentary

Ontario's 2007 election is taking a small page from the past and turning it into a full chapter, with education funding emerging as a major wedge issue for the Oct. 10 vote.

The Conservatives are pushing for faith-based education funding, and the Liberals, the New Democratic Party and the Green party are pushing back. The last time the Tories tried it, they were dealt a blow.

In 2003, Ernie Eves' incumbent Conservatives lost to Premier Dalton McGuinty's Liberals, partly because of the PC Equity in Education Tax Credit, a measure instituted by the Mike Harris government in 2001. It sought to use tax credits to partially reimburse parents for the costs of tuition in "eligible, independent schools," including parents of children in private Jewish day schools.

Ontarians reacted and voted against the platform, not willing to subsidize private schools out of their tax dollars.

This year's PC education plank has been modified and expanded. The John Tory-led Conservatives are now running on a platform of "inclusiveness" for faith-based day schools.

In June, Tory announced that his party wanted to address the "continuing unfairness" of the current education system, under which the province funds Roman Catholic schools, but not other faith-based schools.

"[We] believe that we need to achieve more effective integration of Ontario's increasingly diverse student population into the mainstream of our province," he announced. "That's why we are committed to creating an opportunity for non-Catholic, faith-based schools to choose to join our publicly funded education system the same way Catholic schools have already done."

Tory fleshed out the platform this summer, saying that if elected, his party would create a committee, led by former PC premier Bill Davis, to study the subject and conduct trials with faith-based schools, starting in 2008.

The Conservatives have promised to pump more than $2.4 billion into the public education system by the fourth year of their mandate, if they are elected.

Their platform has been supported by groups such as the Multi-Faith Coalition for Fairness in Education Funding (MFC) and the recently assembled Public Education Fairness Network (PEFN). Both are advocacy groups for Jewish, Sikh, Muslim, Hindu and other non-Catholic communities in the province.

While many faith communities and organizations have lauded the plan, opposition parties and unions have come out fighting against the idea.

On Aug. 23, McGuinty told the Globe and Mail that faith-based education funding was the "defining issue" of this election and said he wanted to "grab Ontarians by the earlobes and say, 'It's not just another election. It's not just business as usual. It's about the kind of Ontario you want.'"

McGuinty and Education Minister Kathleen Wynne have consistently defended the province's practice of funding Catholic schools, saying they have a clear mandate to obey the 1867 Constitution, which sought to protect existing rights for denominational schools of the time, requiring Ontario to maintain a publicly funded Roman Catholic system.

But the MFC and others site a 1999 United Nations Human Rights Committee (UNHRC) ruling stating that Ontario's funding of Roman Catholic schools was discriminatory and violated Canada's obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, because it unequally funded one faith community over others.

UNHRC censured the province again on this issue in a 2005 report.

Despite this, Wynne told The CJN in June that the Liberal position on faith-based education funding "remains the same," and Ben Chin, a senior Liberal spokesperson, asked CJN readers to consider whether "we want to build a society where children play in cultural or religious enclaves. Should the public system be funding separate schools within its own board?"

McGuinty recently criticized the Conservative education plan, saying that, if implemented, it would take needed funds out of the public system and "segregate" students.

PEFN says it's disappointed the Liberals are "encouraging a climate of fear" with talk of segregation and funding private schools and wish McGuinty would see the issue as one of fairness.

Jewish community leaders have also expressed their shock at McGuinty's language.

Bernie Farber, CEO of the Canadian Jewish Congress, recently told the Ottawa Citizen that the premier's comments were "offensive," adding that "it's time for [McGuinty] to step up to the plate and retract this [comment]."

Farber also accused McGuinty of flip-flopping on the issue. In 2001, McGuinty told the Citizen that "there's an issue of unfairness… to be addressed."

For this election, the premier has opted to stand pat with the status quo, saying that Catholic schools will remain publicly funded because "that's the system we inherited."

McGuinty himself went through that system and benefited from it, his detractors point out before asking why the approximately 53,000 other children in religious schools outside the public sector shouldn't derive the same benefits the premier did from his Catholic education.

The Liberals have a different plan.

In an Aug. 14 statement, McGuinty announced the Liberals would put an additional $309 million into the public school system over the next two years to help with educator salaries, school infrastructure maintenance, transportation funding and supplies, among other things.

"When we get public education right, we get the best citizens, the best workers, the best jobs and the best society," McGuinty said.

The Elementary Teachers' Federation of Ontario (ETFO) has come out in favour of the Liberals, and is actively supporting Wynne, encouraging its more than 70,000 members to help her defeat Tory in their head-to-head battle for the Don Valley West riding.

"Funding religious schools is a stealth attack on public education, and it will cripple the system if it's implemented," said Elementary Teachers of Toronto local president, Martin Long, at the EFTO's annual meeting in August.

All of them read prepared statements that followed the same theme – favouring "fairness" for education funding for children outside the public school sector, extolling the virtues and contributions to society of graduates of the various faith-based schools, and lamenting what they perceive as fearmongering by the Liberal government on this subject.

This issue has been garnering increased media attention in recent weeks due to the provincial Conservatives' education election platform, which calls for the incorporation of faith-based schools into the public school system, and the ruling Liberal party's vehement opposition to the idea.

"Today, we are concerned and dismayed at the language of fear being used in this election," Koschitzky said, referring to recent remarks by Premier Dalton McGuinty calling the Tories' plan to fund faith-based schools "segregationist."

"Faith schools teach the values of charity and collective responsibility… and our network will be discussing the ways we can adopt an inclusive system," Koschitzky added.

Singh added that the Sikh community is worried that its children are "not deserving of fair and equal treatment" in the eyes of the province.

The new group says it's non-partisan and will talk with any political party in the election if the party is open to discussing the issue of education funding. As of last week, it had not contacted any of the major political parties about its position.

But its literature mirrors the education platform laid out by the Conservatives, namely that any faith school wishing to enter the public system would need to satisfy three major requirements – adherence to the Ontario curriculum, enforcement of standardized testing and have teachers comply with appropriate governmental standards.

The Tories made this accountability part of their conditions for "inclusive" faith-based school funding.

When asked whether the advocacy group would, by default, be telling its community members to vote Conservative, Bernie Farber, CEO of the CJC, told The CJN that his organization "never advocates for the community to vote one way or the other. Our position is that this has always been a fairness argument. We have advocated it strongly for 25 years. So whatever party grabs onto it, that's fine. Our hope is that every party will eventually come to understand that Ontario is backward on this issue, not forward."

The Public Education Fairness Network follows in the mould of existing lobby groups such as the Multi-Faith Coalition for Equal Funding of Religious Schools (MFC) and the Parents for Equality in Education Funding. Both groups have also worked with the federation and CJC on this issue in the past.

English said the main difference between the groups is that the new one represents faith communities as a whole, while the others mostly represent schools and parents.

When asked how it would promote itself and its cause, English replied that the group plans to "take the message to other parts of Ontario… advertise and conduct events among faith groups to demonstrate harmony," though no precise itinerary has been drawn up.

English could not say how much money the group has to accomplish its task.

In related events, the Multi-Faith Coalition will participate in a town hall meeting at 7 p.m. on Sept. 9 to discuss faith-based education issues with local candidates at the Bais Yaacov elementary school at 15 Saranac Blvd. For more information, contact David 647-887-8033.

'Status quo segregationist'

The provincial NDP has remained relatively silent on this specific issue. Instead, party leader Howard Hampton and his education critic, Rosario Marchese, have called on Ontarians to support "a public education system that puts students and teachers first," and have criticized the McGuinty government for four years of dithering on an education policy that they say failed to "fix the education funding formula, to provide adequate funding to ensure that our public education system is second to none."

The NDP further complains that instead of strengthening education, McGuinty has created a system encouraging "increased reliance on parent fundraising and school boards being taken over because they can't make ends meet."

Venturing beyond environmental matters, the Green Party of Ontario has also come out against faith-based education funding. However, party leader Frank de Jong is taking an unconventional stance, advocating for a complete elimination of taxpayer-funded religious schools, Roman-Catholic ones included.

De Jong called Tory's education plan "retrograde" and added that McGuinty's status quo position is "untenable."

"The status quo is segregationist. When I was a Catholic school child, we were basically told not to play with the public school kids. We didn't play sports with them or associate with them in any way. That's the way it is in Ontario today," he said. "I teach at Fern Avenue Public School [in Parkdale], and our intramural system… never [interacts] with the Catholic school system for sports, musical exchanges… even though there's a Catholic school one block from ours. Yet our kids have to drive across the city to find other public schools to play sports against. What a divisive system… We need to modernize our educational system to be fair to everyone."

Though the official campaign will begin only when the writ is dropped on Sept. 10, an Aug. 20 poll conducted by the Strategic Counsel for the Globe indicated that the race is already shaping up as a close one, with the Liberals currently holding 40 per cent of the electorate, the Conservatives 35 per cent, the NDP 18 per cent and the Green party eight per cent.

Tory candidate stands alone on school funding

The CJN's 2007 Ontario election coverage will present a weekly profile of major Jewish ridings in the GTA. This week's focus is on Richmond Hill.

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

The candidates from the four major in the newly created riding of Richmond Hill are gearing up for the Oct. 10 provincial election in a wide open race that lacks an entrenched incumbent.

Richmond Hill

The riding used to be part of Oak Ridges, represented by Conservative MPP Frank Klees, but is becoming its own riding in this election. It's represented federally by Liberal MP Bryon Wilfert.

The candidates have diverse backgrounds and myriad views on some of the major campaign issues, such as faith-based school funding, electoral reform and the uploading of social service and other costs back to the province.

Conservative candidate Alex Yuan runs A&L Computer Software Ltd., and is the founder and director of the charitable S'port for Kids organization. He immigrated to Canada from Hong Kong as a teenager.

Reza Moridi, the Liberal candidate, is a physicist who has lived in the community for 16 years after immigrating from Iran with his family.

New Democratic Party candidate Nella Cotrupi has lived in Richmond Hill for 18 years. She is a lawyer, lecturer and author who immigrated from Italy as a child.

Liz Couture is the riding's Green Party candidate. She is a self-employed music teacher with a business background and has lived in Richmond Hill for 17 years.

When it comes to the most high-profile issue for Jews in this year's election, only Yuan – in keeping with his party's platform – backs extending public funding to faith-based schools.

"It's very simple," said Conservative candidate Yuan. "I fully support faith-based school funding for simple reasons. I fully believe it will enhance our community by offering choice and fairness."

But the Green Party's Couture said funding faith-based schools would be too costly and complicated.

"If all schools are funded equally, schools can still choose to provide faith-based education based on needs in the community, but children of all faiths would learn together," she said.

NDP candidate Cotrupi expressed a similar view.

"I do think it is important to have that kind of education available. However, I don't think the way to do it is to have a ghettoized community where children are only exposed to other children of the same background," she said.

She added that she chose to put her children into public school rather than Catholic school.

Cotrupi's solution is to have optional religious instruction in the public system for a fee that can be subsidized for those who can't afford it.

Liberal hopeful Moridi attacked the Tory position on the issue, which he said takes the province "backwards."

"When Conservatives say they're going to put millions into private schools, that really means they're going to take millions out of public schools," he said.

A hot topic for all Ontarians is a referendum question on the ballot about moving to a mixed member proportional (MMP) electoral system.

This option, which would replace the first-past-the-post system in Ontario, gives each citizen two votes – one for their local candidate and one for a party.

The system is said to be "mixed" because it blends the first-past-the-post system with proportional representation.

Both Couture and Cotrupi support MMP, saying it better reflects voters' intentions while also giving them local representation.

Yuan opposes MMP, saying it diminishes a voter's personal connection and accessibility to politics.

Moridi said he had no position on the matter, adding that he leaves "the decision up to Ontarians."

On the issue of uploading municipal costs for social services back to the province, the candidates agreed that doing so is important, but they differed on specifics.

Moridi said the Liberals have long been working to reverse the "financial problems for our cities and towns" caused when the Mike Harris Conservatives downloaded a number of formerly provincially funded programs to municipalities.

Couture cited the Green Party's platform of decentralization in her answer, saying that municipalities should be responsible for local programs, as they are "closest to the issues and in the best position to determine the solutions."

She added that debt incurred by municipalities as a result of not being given sufficient provincial funds "is a difficult burden for the municipality to bear."

Yuan said the Conservatives believe that local taxes should be raised only for local services, as opposed to provincial ones. He said Premier Dalton McGuinty's recent offer to give money back to municipalities is "kind of like a blackmail" to get votes.

He said the Conservatives have committed to speed up the review of the situation, with a report due by the end of the year.

"Definitely we will inject money, but we need to understand what exactly is needed," he said.

Cotrupi also criticized McGuinty's recent move to give money to municipalities, calling it "too little, too late."

"We need to get some of those costs back where they belong," she said.

All the candidates said they are happy with Richmond Hill being designated as its own riding, saying that it's a large town with many services and it's important for it to receive recognition.

Geographically, the riding stretches from Highway 404 in the east to Bathurst Street in the west. The south is bordered by Highway 7, and the north is bordered by Elgin Mills Road west until Yonge Street, where it reaches north to Gamble Road. It encompasses most of the town of Richmond Hill.

According to the 2001 census, the riding has a population of 109,395 people, and just under nine per cent – √9,385 – are Jewish. The largest visible minority – 25,665 people, or just under a quarter of residents – is Chinese.

The average individual income is $37,061, and the average household income is $87,495.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

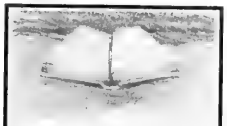
Emphasis on God as King



Rabbinic Reflections

Does the theme of God as King make you scared or make you feel secure?

One of the themes of Rosh Hashanah is that of God as King. But when we emphasize the concept of God as King, are we to cower, frightened, overwhelmed by majesty? Or does this emphasis bring Him down closer, make Him more tangible, more accessible to us?

Now let me just sharpen this question a bit. Obviously, God is King all year round. In fact, in every blessing we make we say, "Melech Haolam," "King of the Universe." He doesn't change. We change our emphasis. We relate to Him as Creator, as King, as Judge, as Father, as Shchinah or female presence, as Healer, as Source of Prosperity.

But at different times in the year we try to emphasize a particular aspect. At Rosh Hashanah, we emphasize monarchy, God as King. In the main blessing of the Amidah and in Kiddush, we say "Melech al kol ha'aretz," "King over the entire world." The most famous tune of the holidays is Avinu Malkeinu, Our Father, Our King. The Mussaf has an entire blessing emphasizing God's monarchy. Much of its poetry emphasizes the "Melech elyon," the lofty King. The bakeries make the impressive crown challahs. The Chassidim emphasize beautiful march tunes, as if to accompany the King.

Back to our question. What do we seek to create within ourselves by emphasizing God as King?

Do we think of Henry V and worry about our heads being cut off? Do we become overcome with dread, with fear, of the King who has life and death in his hands? The tyrannical King, the powerful King.

Or is it the benevolent King? Are we bringing the lofty and ineffable down here close to us – the King who protects his people, who touches the cheek of the children, who worries about the well-being of his subjects?

When we alter the text from "Melech Haolam" to "Melech al kol ha'aretz," from "King of the Universe" to "King over all the land," are we pushing Him farther away or bringing Him down closer? It sounds as though we want Him to be immanent, to be close – King of the Universe to King of the land sounds like bringing Him close.

How about "Avinu Malkeinu," "our Father, our King"? Well, Father is certainly close, but is the King the benevolent, warm, fatherly king, or the harsh king, in contrast to the father?

Is the King of judgment the King who sentences or the King who pardons? We have that even today – the president of the United States cannot convict, but he can pardon a criminal. Are we emphasizing the King as the one who pardons, the kind, benevolent King?

We think of a king as a king over 100 million people, but actually, historically, that is not what a king was. We have stories in the Torah of the kings of cities – the kings of five cities fighting the kings of four cities. Sounds to me as though if you lived in that city, you would know the king personally. He would be familiar to all.

When we sing the beautiful song of Avinu Malkeinu, does that tune evoke awe and trembling – or warmth, concern, empathy? To me, it feels like an embrace – albeit a royal embrace, but an embrace nonetheless – the embrace of the benevolent King, worried about the well-being of His people.

As in so much of our tradition, there are multiple layers of meaning to the notion of God as King that we emphasize on Rosh Hashanah. There is awe and trembling. But there is also the immanence, drawing the Divine down close, the closeness of the King whom I can sense and whose embrace I can feel.

Shanah tovah.

Let's widen the tent flaps

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

Disciples of the Rabbi of Lvov met to discuss the corrupt ways of the new generation, those who were giving up the old customs and backsliding spiritually. They thought it imperative to do something, and so they resolved to set up stronger boundaries, to keep those backsliders away from the centre of religious life. Several tzaddikim reported to their rebbe the decision to cast these "renegades" far outside the community. His simple answer stunned them. "Do you think I love you more than them?"

For indeed, the farther away a Jew is, the more we are commanded to love him and to bring her close.

For me, that is the central theme of the upcoming High Holy Days. Think of the story of Hagar that we read on Rosh Hashanah. We Jews have experienced Hagar's estrangement time and time again as we are cast aside, denied or passed over.

Hagar, the Egyptian slave, symbolizes the true outsider. Her experience in the desert is the personification of alienation. What better time to talk about alienation than on the High Holy Days, when we hope to "come back in"? When better to talk about outsiders and insiders than these days, when the proverbial gates "open" wide. This story asks us on the New Year, "Are you going in? Or are you staying out?"

But let's say that the marginal Jew does opt in. Will the Jewish community make room for Jews who are alienated, pushed out – the Hagars among us? For Jews who are unemployed, or poor, who don't live in the Bathurst corridor with 2.2 kids and a dog? Jews who are intermarried, afraid of rejection, used to rejection, expecting rejection? Jews who are gay, lesbian, bisexual or transgendered? Jews we can't put a label on, who don't fit neatly into our heterosexual male-and-female-married-with-children-nice-Jewish couple stereotype? Jews who don't fit the denominational labels? Jews who feel unwelcome because they only come to synagogue "once a year"? Jews who feel patronized because they aren't married or don't have kids? Jews who didn't grow up Jewish, who became Jewishly active as adults or through conversion and don't have Jewish memories and Jewish bubbies or zaides, who don't understand the Yiddish phrases we casually toss out and then condescendingly ask if they know what we are talking about?

Hagar's story is about us. Like all outsiders, she doesn't know how to get in. She waits for the helping hand, the outstretched arm, the phone call, the welcome letter, the visit. We Israelites, once used to the warmth of the Middle Eastern sun, can be a cold people.

The story is even about the lines we draw at High Holy Day services. Maybe you came last year, you know what to expect, you're reading Torah, you're an usher, or you just look like you know what you are doing. The person near you is clearly uncomfortable, a newcomer, a "shul shopper." Will you judge them as unworthy, or will you lean over and help them find the page?

Can we widen the Jewish community's tent flaps just a little in the New Year? Then we will be able to say the gates are truly open.

Jewish Life

The value of tzedakah

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

"All of man's earnings are decreed on Rosh Hashanah, except for expenses regarding Shabbat and Yom Tov and expenses relating to Jewish education" (Beitzah 16a). Though the above is hard to prove, and must have no practical bearing on how we dispense our wealth, it reflects the fundamental notion that while we are required to work for our sustenance, ultimately it's only through the blessings of God that our endeavours meet with success.

One who cheats, cuts corners and does not conduct monetary dealings with full integrity not only cheats his fellow man but undermines God's plan for division of the world's wealth. With this understanding, the Talmud's statement that the first question that God will address to us after 120 years, nasata v'-natata b'emunah, takes on new meaning. Normally translated "were your business dealings conducted honestly" this basic facet of the question does not do full justice to the term emunah, which relates to our faith in God. In truth, our monetary dealings are the best barometer of our true faith in God. If one believes that God decrees how much wealth all are to be blessed (or not so blessed) with, why interfere with His plan?

Proper allocation of wealth forms one of the three components enabling us to "influence" the decision-making process of God. As we read in the machzor, "Repentance, prayer and tzedakah annul the evil decree." While repentance relates to all aspects of Judaism, and prayer allows man to silently address of his needs to the Almighty, the only mitzvah per se that has such power is tzedakah, the sharing of our wealth with others. At a most basic level, if we are asking God to bestow favour upon us and inscribe us in the book of long life, good health, sustenance and support, then we must be willing to help others in their time of need.

Tzedakah is not only for the benefit of the needy, it is of equal, if not greater, benefit to the donor. The giving of tzedakah should develop within those who are fortunate enough to be able to share God's blessings with others the character traits of mercy, kindness and gratitude. The hard work and business savvy one may possess has little bearing on the cornerstone of our faith: that our wealth is a gift from God, who has entrusted His bounty with us to be used as He has instructed. The goal of tzedakah is not just to try to alleviate poverty – an impossible goal, "for the poor shall never cease" (Deuteronomy 15:11) – but to instil within us the need to identify with and to feel the pain of others.

As Jews who see the proper accumulation and sharing of wealth as one of the noblest way to serve God, we must be open to deriving for ourselves spiritual lessons from the workings of the marketplace.

Thus, while the stock market is a vehicle to (try to) make money, it can, it seems to me, also provide a valuable moral message.

Perhaps the recent volatility in the stock market can help highlight for us how fleeting wealth really can be and often is. Years of careful investing can be ruined overnight due to decisions and events over which we have no control and by companies in which we have no investments. Our wealth is truly not in our hands.

While this may be frightening if we are able to "conduct our business dealings faithfully," we accept our monetary losses as expressing the inscrutable Divine will. As long as we our blessed with wealth, Jewish law demands that we share at least 10 per cent, and preferably 20 per cent, of our (net) income with others.

Shmittah and your money

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Last week, I wrote about the approaching shmittah year, during which farmers, gardeners and consumers face various restrictions about the planting, harvesting and eating of Israeli produce. While those laws apply only to agriculture in the Land of Israel, there is another category of shmittah that applies to Jews everywhere. And like shmittah of the land, it brings with it its own controversies.

We are told in Deuteronomy 15:1-2, that "at the end of every seven years… every creditor shall remit any debt owed by his neighbour and brother." [tinyurl.com/2u5854] In other words, every seven years, all Jews forgive debts owed to them. [tinyurl.com/23d8p3]

What good is served by setting up a system in which certain debts are just wiped out? Rabbi Abraham Isaac HaCohen Kook, the first chief rabbi of what was then Palestine, suggested that "the seventh year serves to rectify the social ills and inequalities that accumulate in society over the years… The sabbatical year comes to correct this situation of inequality and societal rifts by removing a major source of power of the elite: debts owed to them." [tinyurl.com/ yvqa9p]

Sounds good in theory. But in practice, Jews 2,000 years ago weren't living up to the standards set out in the Torah. As the shmittah year approached, they became less and less inclined to lend money because they feared they'd never see it again. So Hillel the Elder devised a solution: have Jews assign all their private debts to public administration. That way, the debts wouldn't be wiped out and the economy would continue to work as it should. This financial arrangement created by Hillel is known as the "Prozbul."

The wording is quite simple. "I, the undersigned, transfer to you, X, Y and Z, all debts that are owed me, in writing or verbally, so that I may collect them at any time I desire." You can view online a Hebrew copy of a Prozbul document created by the Chief Rabbinate of Israel just prior to the shmittah year of 5754 (1994-95). [tinyurl.com/2jru26]

Actually, a document isn't necessary. The Prozbul can be recited before three adult men who constitute a court. One approaches this "court" and states that he/she is transferring to them all debts that are owed to him/her, thus making them collectable. If that option is not available to you, there is a high-tech alternative: a free online form that can be filled out before Rosh Hashanah. [tinyurl.com/2xl2p4]

But the Prozbul has been controversial. As Rabbi Shmuel Jablon explains, "the Prozbul has been praised as a creative method in which the rabbis responded creatively to a difficulty. Critics say the rabbis have overstepped their bounds and have fabricated a legal fiction or loophole." [rabbijablon.com] Had Hillel devised a way to nullify a biblical commandment?

Defenders say no. They explain that the laws of shmittah are connected to a 50-year cycle of the calendar known as the Jubilee. As Rabbi Louis Jacobs writes, "The name Jubilee is from the Hebrew word yovel, "ram's horn," the year being so called because a ram's horn was sounded when it was proclaimed (Leviticus 25:9). Since this verse says, "[Proclaim liberty] throughout the land for all its inhabitants," the talmudic view is that the Jubilee was not observed during the Second Temple period [or since] because the majority of Jews no longer lived in the land of Israel." [tinyurl.com/79tqd]

In other words, the biblical laws of shmittah do not apply today, but rabbis continue to enforce them so that they don't become forgotten. Or as the anonymous author(s) of the Wikipedia entry puts it, "Hillel, great as he was, most certainly did not change a law of the Torah in order to fit the needs of his time. He and his beit din enacted a rabbinic exception to a rabbinic law… When most Jews again live in the land of Israel and the observance of the sabbatical and Jubilee years are toraitic commandments, the Prozbul will no longer be able to be used." [en.wikipedia.org/ wiki/Prosbul]

Until then, nothing is stopping you from fulfilling the letter of the law, especially at an auspicious time like Rosh Hashanah eve. Right after they go through the Prozbul ceremony, some people have a custom of lending a few dollars that are not covered by the Prozbul. As the shmittah year ends, the debts are wiped out and another mitzvah is fulfilled. [tinyurl.com/33zawk]

Faith communities come together on education

News conference announces formation of Public Education Fairness Network

Last week, representatives of the Armenian, Hindu, Jewish, Muslim and Sikh communities came together at a news conference to announce the formation of the Public Education Fairness Network to promote fairness in education funding for all Ontario faith-based schools.

The Fairness Network is committed to including all faith-based schools that follow the Ontario curriculum, commit to standardized testing and hire qualified teachers in the Ontario public education system.

Support for this initiative is based on a number of key principles:

- Funding only one faith's schools is unfair and indefensible
- A climate of fear that has crept into the debate on this issue should be rejected
- A deep commitment to the public education system
- Strong support for accountability by funded faith-based schools for what they teach

The Fairness Network will work to educate Ontarians about this issue and demonstrate the positive reality of faith-based schools through non-partisan advocacy efforts.

At a recent news conference, representatives of the Armenian, Hindu, Jewish, Muslim and Sikh communities announced the formaton of the Public Education Fairness Network.

Below are excerpts from remarks made by the faith community representatives at the news conference:

We believe that every child who attends a faith-based school that meets provincial standards should be part of the public education system. It's just a matter of fairness. – Sivan Karshafian, board member and graduate of the Armenian Relief Society Day School.

I have always been proud to live in Ontario – a province I truly believed was open to minority communities. But when it comes to inclusion of faith-based schools in the public system, Ontario's door remains closed. – Latif Mirza, general secretary of the Islamic Circle of North America – Canada

Ontario's faith-based schools are agents of social cohesion… Thousands of the best and brightest citizens of Ontario, fully contributing to Canadian society, are products of faith-based schools…Faith-based schools teach sacred values – the value of charity, the value of volunteerism, and the value of collective responsibility – to help make Canada a better place. To say otherwise is to invite fear. – David Koschitzky, UJA Federation vice chair on behalf of UJA and Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region

The present situation, which includes 650,000 Catholic students in the publicly funded education system but excludes 53,000 other faith-based students, is blatantly unfair. No amount of rhetorical side-stepping can change the nature of this situation. – Shahen Mirakian, graduate of the Armenian Relief Society Day School

We are deeply concerned by the fact that we are not provided with fair and equal treatment. It is painful for us to be viewed as less deserving of a rightful place within the public education system, especially when we want our children to be productive citizens of Canada and the province of Ontario. - Balwinder Singh, Ontario Sikh and Gurdwara Council representative.

UJA Federation & IsraAID join forces for Peru

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has joined forces with IsraAID: The Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid, in assisting victims of Peru's recent earthquake.

Shortly after the earthquake hit, UJA Federation launched a Relief Fund, and has since sent a portion of funds raised to IsraAID.

The IsraAID medical team, consisting of seven Israeli doctors and nurses, is currently on the ground, together with volunteers from Lima's Jewish community, to deliver basic medical treatment and relief supplies.

"When we arrived at the village, dozens of people were already waiting for us," said IsraAID nurse Hannah Budin. "Children stood in line quietly waiting their turn. We saw the sadness in the eyes of the men and women and their despair at being left with nothing."

"I feel proud that IsraAID could help these people, many of whom lost everything in this devastating earthquake," said Shachar Zahavi, chairman of IsraAID. "We believe that our partnership with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto helped our team provide the best and fastest assistance possible."

Shortly after their arrival in Peru, the IsraAid delegation began work in Canneta and from there, branched out to various disaster sites. The team then visited the town of Bella Vista and opened a medical clinic in a local school where 120 people were treated.

A couple of days later, the IsraAid medical team opened a field clinic in the village of Santa Barbara where they treated over 150 people. Water and electricity supplies were badly damaged in the village and most of the houses in the area were destroyed, leaving families with only tents as shelter. The team then proceeded to Santa Cruz and opened a clinic in a local church where they treated another 120 villagers and distributed food and water.

"UJA Federation was delighted to have teamed up with IsraAid again through the funds raised by our Earthquake Relief Fund," said UJA Federation president and CEO Ted Sokolsky. "We have partnered in the past with IsraAid in response to the South Asian tsunami, the earthquake in Pakistan and extensively during Hurricane Katrina. They are a proven group of dedicated, knowledgeable and fearless professionals who care about the world in which they live. Moreover, they are tremendous ambassadors for Israel throughout the world and put into action the real principles of tikun olam, repairing the world."

Atidim helps Israelis reach their potential

Financing a university degree is an expensive proposition for many students throughout the world. For students from disadvantaged backgrounds, it is often impossible. For this reason, the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) – UJA Federation's overseas partner - and its donors throughout the world, played a critical role in the creation and maintenance of Atidim, a program that enables capable young people from disadvantaged backgrounds to earn a bachelor's degree and receive the tools they need to succeed throughout their lives.

Miriam Zecharia

The program, which combines an academic degree, army service and the receipt of a teacher's certificate, requires that participants return to the classroom as teachers, so that they can play a role in securing the future of other Israeli children.

Born in Israel's periphery town of Ashdod, Miriam Zecharia, 19, is bright, full of energy, and passionate about the path she has chosen with Atidim's Military Academics Reserve – Science Teachers Program. "My parents were always encouraging me to think and to learn," says Miriam. "And I desperately wanted to study at university, but I didn't want to financially burden my parents."

When it came time for her military service, she made a major life decision: she decided to join Atidim's first class in the Military Academics Reserve – Science Teachers Program. The program enables students to postpone their military service in order to earn a bachelor's degree (in English or one of the sciences) and a teaching certificate.

After completing her studies, Miriam will serve in the army for six years as an academic officer while working as a science teacher in a disadvantaged high school. She plans to return to her hometown of Ashdod to teach and give back to the community she came from. "I believe that teachers can effect change. And as a teacher in a military uniform, I will command a lot of respect from my students and will set a personal example of how education is the key to future success."

Miriam joined Atidim for herself and for her country. She loves teaching and seeing how people think, especially children. She wants to become a chemistry teacher in order to dispel the fear that many children have of this subject. "I want to motivate children to love learning as I do," she says.

Through Atidim, Israel's disadvantaged youth will not only receive the education that is essential for building a secure future, but they will help other Israeli children receive the education that is necessary for their success.

UJA Federation launches the Campaign for Our Jewish Future

Multi-pronged plan offers groundbreaking strategies

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

Approximately 1,000 members of Toronto's Jewish community made their way to the Fairmont Royal York Hotel last week for the launch of UJA Federation's annual campaign, one which appears decidedly different than those of years past.

Billed as the Campaign 2008: Campaign for Our Jewish Future is just that. Built on the belief that Jewish security and identity are increasingly called into question today, the Campaign for Our Jewish Future introduces a variety of new initiatives to overcome these challenges, ensuring a strong and vibrant Jewish future.

In order to make this far-reaching, strategic plan a reality, over the next two years, UJA Federation needs its annual campaign to grow to $75 million - a 25% increase over its current base of $60 million.

"The Jewish world of 2007 is fundamentally different and more challenging than it was just ten short years ago," said Lesley Binstock Offman, chair of Campaign 2008, along with Morris Perlis. "Today, more than ever, we must respond with strength and vision to address pressing issues here at home and in Israel."

The Campaign for Our Jewish Future is a multi-faceted plan to address issues facing the Jewish community today, covering four vital areas of concern:

- Inspiring Jewish identity among the next generation: A series of new initiatives designed to engage and inspire our future Jewish leaders. Initiatives include Project 25/35, CampRight, The Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education and The Institute for New Jewish Leadership.
- Standing with Israel: In coordination with local partners and municipalities, UJA Federation will continue to provide critical resources to create civic pride, economic independence, civil preparedness and assist the residents of two vulnerable communities, The Galilee and Sderot.
- Transforming lives: A unique program aimed at lifting the Jewish community's "working poor" out of poverty and onto the path of self-reliance. The program will also create a new array of services, with the objective of allowing seniors to age with dignity while continuing to participate in the community.
- Engaging a growing and dynamic community: For generations Toronto has been a magnet for wave after wave of new immigrants from Israel and the former Soviet Union, in particular. This new initiative will engage them in community life in order to strengthen it.

"Last year, you responded to an emergency," Perlis told launch participants, referring to UJA Federation's Israel Emergency Campaign 2007, launched in response to Israel's war with Hezbollah. "This year, there are still a number of very serious and mounting concerns that need your support both in communities along Israel's border and in Toronto. Tonight we can begin to build a thriving Jewish future together. If not now, when?"

The launch – chaired by Lynn Belzberg and Dale Lastman – included a moving performance by the Sderot Youth Choir and a keynote address by author, actor and comedian Larry Miller. David Stein, the 10,000th Torontonian to take part on the Taglit-birthright israel trip also addressed those in attendance.

Toronto's Joe Lebovic sponsors Hungarian youth on birthright israel

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

Toronto's Joseph Lebovic is, quite clearly, a man on a mission. The visionary Canadian philanthropist, who supports a number of community institutions across the GTA, including Vaughan's Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, continues to reach out to the Jewish youngsters of Hungary.

Lebovic who, for the second straight year, recently sponsored 40 Hungarian young adults between the ages of 18 to 26 on a CIE Taglit - birthright israel trip, feels it's incumbent on him to help them change their mindset.

"I met with these young people in Budapest before going to Israel, and I spoke to them, in Hungarian, about why birthright israel is so important and why they must become proud of their heritage as Hungarian Jews," said Lebovic. "I know where they come from."

Following his trip to Budapest, he joined up with the group on their second day in Israel aboard their CIE Taglit-birthright israel trip.

"Not only does Joe take the time to meet with these kids in their hometown, he then goes to experience Israel with them, through their eyes," said Elizabeth Sokolsky, vice president, education & operations, Taglit - birthright israel. "Joe's generosity is not only financial, but it's a real outpouring from his heart."

Joe Lebovic, along with one of the 40 Hungarian CIE Taglit - birthright israel participants he sponsored, stops for some nourishment in Jerusalem.

According to Lebovic, who originally chose to sponsor the group because he lived in Hungary during the war, it's essential to not only instill in these young people a sense of pride but knowledge, as well.

"Lots of these kids' parents lived under communist regimes where they weren't allowed to practice their Judaism," said Lebovic. "Many of them still live in fear, afraid to tell even their friends that they are Jewish. One thing birthright israel shows them is that now – unlike when their parents were kids - they have Israel, and that there are strong Jewish communities around the world like right here in Canada. And, of course, it's in Israel's best interest to have all of these strong Diaspora communities. I'm trying to teach them to be proud of their Hungarian heritage and that, per capita, Hungary has produced so many successful, talented Jews, in so many areas of the arts, business and medicine, and that they need to follow in those footsteps. They need to feel comfortable – as Jews - in their homeland, or wherever they may travel, not just in Israel."

Lebovic is visibly upset by the lack of proper facilities for Budapest's Jewish university students and, as is his nature, is intent on remedying the situation.

"There's around 5,000 Jewish university students in Budapest today, so I'm trying to have a Hillel House built there so these young people can receive Jewish programming all year round and continue to learn and grow as Jews," he said. "It's also important for those who come home after birthright israel to build on that sense of Jewish connection they received while in Israel. That's the biggest challenge of birthright israel - keeping the excitement going after they get off the plane back home. We need to do something more to instill Jewish pride in today's youth and to sustain Jewish life."

A great summer thanks to JAFI

Thanks to the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner, thousands of youngsters from Sderot and the Gaza perimeter enjoyed summer as kids should – at summer camps. With the help of their partners, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, JAFI moved countless youngsters away from the line of fire to JAFI-organized summer camps in safer parts of the country. (Pictured) As campers at one of the camps prepare for the end of summer, they pose with their JAFI T-shirts, to say thank you.

Rachel Corrie play to run in Toronto in '08

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Since theatre company CanStage opted not to run My Name is Rachel Corrie, the controversial play about an American activist who was killed in 2003 when she stepped in front of an Israeli bulldozer, another Toronto-based theatre company picked up the rights to run the show.

From May 29 to June 22, the play will be presented by Theatre Panik at the Tarragon Extra Space.

The play, which is based on Corrie's e-mails, letters and journal entries, is about a 23-year-old woman from Olympia, Wash., who travelled to Rafah in the Gaza strip as a member of the pro-Palestinian International Solidarity Movement. She died when she stepped in front of an Israeli bulldozer that was leveling a Palestinian home that the Israeli army suspected of sitting on top of tunnels terrorists use to smuggle weapons.

When Martin Bragg, the artistic producer of CanStage, told The CJN last year he had acquired the rights to run the show for the 2007-08 season, Jewish groups and prominent donors complained that the play is anti-Israel and anti-Semitic.

The Toronto Star later reported that after seeing the play in New York, Bragg announced that CanStage would not run the show because it "didn't seem as powerful on stage as it did on the page," but many suspect he gave into pressure from donors.

Despite the controversy surrounding the play when it ran in London, which was co-edited by the Guardian's features editor Katherine Viner and co-edited and directed by British actor Alan Rickman who played Severus Snape in the Harry Potter series, it will run in Toronto next spring.

Niki Landau, the co-artistic director of Theatre Panik, who is Jewish, is very excited about running the play out of her theatre company, which has produced plays in the recent past with Jewish themes including Territories, a play about a Jewish woman and a Palestinian man, and The Finger, which is based on a Yiddish folk tale.

Landau said that she had been trying for almost two years to acquire the rights to the show, but eventually gave up on the idea because the controversy surrounding the production in New York complicated the process.

She said that long after they had stopped pursuing the rights, Kate Lushington, the director, called to offer her theatre company the rights to produce the show.

"It was a nice surprise because by that point, we thought, this is not going to be possible," Landau said.

She said that although she's never seen the play, she's read the script several times and can relate to Corrie.

"I identify with the idea of being young and passionate, whether it is about the world or about writing or anything like that. Rachel Corrie also wanted to be a poet and a writer and had artistic aspirations and was really passionate about doing things in the world and making changes… Had she lived, her view would have changed and grown and gone through all sorts of changes that we do when we get older, but she is captured in a particular time that I think for a lot of us, we recognize," Landau said.

She said that since it was announced that Theatre Panik would present the play, she hasn't received any negative feedback about her decision to do so.

"I'm only worried about it in the sense that I would be sad if there are people out there who are scared to see the play, or who felt that people should be scared to see the play. I think when people actually see the play they are surprised by the fact that it isn't nearly as frightening as they thought it would be... One of the things I think is really important about doing the play is that people will see that she was just a young woman who had good intentions, whether you agree with her or not."

During a CJN interview last year, a spokesperson for the Canada-Israel Committee said that although everyone in this country has the right to free speech, the play was being used to achieve a political end.

"While CIC has no comment on the artistic merits of the show, it is unfortunate that a Canadian theatre company would choose to produce a play that draws attention away from the real victims in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict."

But Landau said she wants to reassure members of the Jewish community in Toronto that she will be sensitive to their concerns.

"We're a very Jewish theatre company. It is not our mandate or anything, but my husband and I run it and we're both Jewish, the director is Jewish and the assistant director is Jewish, so we have a really strong feeling for the community and that is why I wanted it to be our company that did it, rather than a company that had no sense of what this entailed.

"I think I want to reassure people that we're going to be sensitive and that it is important to hear it and see it and then make up their mind about what they think about it. I think that is what theatre is for."

‘The Mercaz’ name change causes confusion

Former BJE has similar name to Conservative group

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When UJA Federation of Greater Toronto’s Board of Jewish Education (BJE) changed its name on July 1 to the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education, the new entity became known informally as the Mercaz.

This week, the organization is running an ad in The CJN under the headline, “What’s in a name?” to clarify any potential confusion between itself and Mercaz-Canada, the Zionist arm of the Conservative movement in Canada.

Seymour Epstein

“There definitely was confusion,” Marion Mayman, national president of Mercaz-Canada, told The CJN last week. Mayman learned of the new name only after it had actually been changed.

Marilyn Cohen, executive director of Mercaz-Canada, said she received comments from members of her Conservative synagogue, who were confused over the similarity between the names. Likewise, Mayman heard from members of other organizations who had questions about the change.

Also, Cohen added, not long after the BJE became the Mercaz, a woman walked into the Mercaz-Canada office thinking it was the new Jewish education entity.

Cohen, Mayman and two other Conservative lay leaders wrote to Seymour Epstein, executive director of the Mercaz, requesting a meeting and stating their reservations over the new name.

In July, a small delegation met with Epstein and Mark Anshan, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto’s general counsel and director of public affairs, to discuss their concerns.

The Mercaz-Canada group was upset initially, but its differences with the Mercaz were worked out “in a collegial and respectful manner,” said Cohen.

Epstein said the ad is now being run as a courtesy to Mercaz-Canada, and to “be certain there’s a complete and full distinction” between the two organizations.

He said the issue of potential confusion never came up in the two-year planning process that preceded the change.

“There’s a million mercazim. It just means ‘centre.’ There should be no problem whatsoever. For us, it’s only a nickname.

“People like to have a nickname for any name that’s long. It seemed natural.”

Once concerns became apparent, however, “we were just as concerned that there be no confusion,” said Epstein.

The ad states that the Mercaz “acknowledges Mercaz-Canada as one of its important partners, and has the highest respect for the organization and its values.”

Epstein elaborated that “in general, there is a warm relationship between the Conservative movement and Jews in Toronto and the federation....We have a strong interest in Jewish education. Camp Ramah and USY [United Synagogue Youth] are all arms of the Conservative movement.”

Marion Mayman

Mayman said that rather than making an issue out of the similarity of the names, she would like to reduce confusion and let people know about Mercaz-Canada, the relatively low-profile counterpart of ARZA Canada in the Reform movement and Mizrachi Canada in the Orthodox world.

The organization has been known locally as “Mercaz” since 1987.

“I think it’s very important for the world out there to know that there is a Mercaz-Canada,” Mayman said, adding that its new board has members from Halifax to Vancouver.

The organization offers scholarships to offset the cost of adult and youth educational trips to Israel that are sponsored by the Conservative movement, she said. It also promotes religious pluralism and recognition of Masorti Judaism in Israel, and lobbies at meetings of the World Zionist Organization and the Jewish Agency every four years for funding of Masorti initiatives in Israel.

Mercaz-Canada, which has about 5,000 members, is part of a world-wide organization including chapters in the United States, the United Kingdom, France, Israel, Germany, Argentina, Chile, Uruguay, Brazil, Mexico, Hungary, Russia and Ukraine. As well, according to the international organization’s website, chapters are being set up in the Netherlands, Czech Republic and Australia.

Preserving family treasures focus of workshop

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
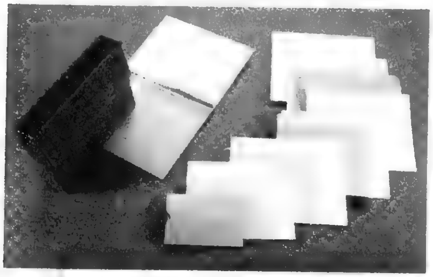
CJN Intern

Learn how to preserve your family treasures at a workshop run by the Ontario Jewish Archives (OJA).

The Sept. 9 workshop aims to teach people how to protect valuable belongings such as photographs, letters, diaries and other documents, said OJA director Ellen Scheinberg.



"The main purpose is to educate people on how to best care for their family treasures," Scheinberg said.

"That includes how to store them in terms of where to keep them, and how to store them in terms of the boxes you use, or the file folders, and how to deal with photos or documents that require conservation after, for example, a flood or damage from insects."

Scheinberg said floods are extremely common in Toronto, and often are responsible for damaging precious mementos.

The workshop runs from 1 to 3 p.m. at the Lipa Green Building, 4600 Bathurst St., and is being led by Scheinberg and professional photograph conservator Lincoln Ross. Scheinberg has been OJA director for five years and before that worked at the Library and Archives of Canada for 10 years. Ross has worked for a number of different organizations, including the City of Toronto Archives.

Workshop participants are asked to bring a photograph, letter or other memento for a consultation with Scheinberg and Ross.

This is the first workshop of its kind run by the OJA, and Scheinberg said it was organized because people kept coming to her with questions about preservation.

"This kind of workshop is really important just to give people the basics on how to care for their treasures," she said.

Scheinberg said people are most concerned about where to store their documents, but often end up storing them in a location where they can be damaged.

"They often store them in basements. It's one of the worst places to keep them. Basements are most susceptible to mould and flooding. It's best to keep them in a safe place that's higher up in the house."

She said the best place to keep your treasures, if they have value to the community, is at the archives.

Scheinberg encourages people with such documents to meet with her and discuss whether they are appropriate to store with the OJA.

This is a smart choice, she said, because of OJA's professional archival staff, state-of-the-art fire-extinguishing program and environmental controls to prevent issues like mould.

The fee for the workshop is $25. Advance registration is required. Contact 416-635-2883, ext. 170, or ojal@ujafed.org.

The Betty Arlin dancers during an August 26 performance at Baycrest.

An ensemble of singers and dancers prove the Variety Players to be aptly named.

Seniors song and dance troupe hits a high note

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

The Variety Players, a seniors entertainment group that has raised over $100,000 for charity, is warming up for a Sept. 30 performance at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

"It's an amazing show," said Shae Eckler, producer and director of the group as well as one of the dancers. She has been with the Variety Players for 10 of the 12 years it has been in existence.

The Variety Players features eight Betty Arlin dancers, named for its choreographer, and about 15 singers. The group prepares and performs a new show every year, and does about eight performances annually across Toronto.

The show features catchy and upbeat tunes, Broadway and otherwise, solos, duets and six tap and softshoe dance numbers that each feature a different costume. There are even some joke-telling sets between acts.

"That's why we're called the Variety Players," Eckler said about the diverse range of entertainment offered.

Choreographer Betty Arlin has been with the troupe for 11 years. An avid dancer since childhood, when she moved to Toronto from Montreal she immediately started looking for something up her alley – before she even unpacked.

"I left all the cartons and went immediately to a rehearsal, and from then on it never stopped," Arlin said.

The show's intrigue and entertainment value lies with the energetic seniors, she said.

"We aim for perfection in movement. Obviously we're not young, but we try to keep everything as perfect as possible. Everyone has to play their part very well."

All Variety Players members are 65 years old and up.

The group used to perform at the Fairview Library Theatre, until the cost of the theatre became too high to donate the remaining money to charity, something the group has always done. They have raised over $100,000 for charities such as the Hospital for Sick Children, Baycrest Foundation and the Heart and Stroke Foundation.

Since leaving Fairview Library Theatre, the seniors bring their show on the road, performing mainly at seniors homes and community centres.

The Beth Tikvah show is on Sunday, Sept. 30 at 7:30. Tickets are $18 and are available by calling the synagogue office at 416-221-3433. Proceeds will be donated to the Beth Tikvah charitable foundation.

Ethiopian-Israeli teens travel to Toronto for music program

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The music department at the Koffler Centre of the Arts, and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto teamed up to host four teens from Kiryat Moshe, a community in Israel with a large Ethiopian community, for a week-long DJ training program.

Four Ethiopian-Israelis – Sisay Ayalin, Avue Dawit, Adeal Zamaro and Rachel Smani – between the ages of 14 and 18, were in Toronto from August 26 to Sept. 2, during which they participated in a DJ program run by Abby Tobias, the founder of Scratchlab Institute, a company designed to instruct people how to DJ at various skill levels.

Adrienne Cohen, the director of music at the Koffler Centre of the Arts, explained how she became invested in reaching out to the Ethiopian community in Kiryat Moshe.

"In April of this year I was in Israel, and UJA arranged for me to go to Kiryat Moshe to see the community centre and meet with the co-ordinators over there," she said, adding that the Kiryat Moshe community centre was developed by UJA to give support to the members of this underprivileged community by providing them with help with their schoolwork, learning Hebrew, and providing them with other social programs.

"One of the projects they were working on is music related. They do rap music, they write their own lyrics and the co-ordinators feel that this greatly helps the kids to express themselves in a positive way," Cohen said.

Out of this came the idea to raise money to create a DJ program at the community centre in Kiryat Moshe.

She said that while she was in Israel, she met with Laura Kindler, a social worker with UJA in Israel who has been creating programs for the children there, and began working with her to develop the week-long program in Toronto.

"I have been working with [Kindler] and Adam Minsky [the director of Israel and overseas programs for UJA Federation] to develop this project for this week. Adam, with UJA, has been the primary financial support for the program."

Cohen felt she could contribute to this program because she knew Tobias – the Scratchlab Institute founder and president of Sole Power Productions Inc., an entertainment and production company – and she knew that he liked to do community work.

"Abby suggested that if the kids came to Toronto, he could give them intensive DJ training for four days. They have been working with David Campbell, who is a renowned DJ in the Toronto nightclub scene," Cohen said.

“They are so excited. They are really into this. They were impressed by the DJ school, they didn’t realize how professional it really was and how challenging it is. They seem to be thriving on that challenge… They are getting training in an area they are very interested in. They are getting the opportunity to study with professional DJs on the Canadian scene and they can take that back to Israel with them and develop their own styles.”

This is the first time UJA has sponsored members of the Israeli Ethiopian community to come to Toronto, but Cohen said she hopes this would become an annual program.

“[Ethiopian-Israelis] are trying very hard to make a life for themselves and integrate into the Israeli community… The children are so beautiful, they are so precious and we just want to see them have a positive future. Whatever we can do.”

During their stay, the teens, accompanied by Kindler and an Ethiopian-Israeli DJ who also acted as their translator, stayed in a condominium downtown and were dinner guests at the homes of members of the Jewish community and UJA volunteers, including Barbara Bank and Ariella Rohringer.

Their days were filled with music-related activities including African drumming classes and Brazilian carnival music lessons. They also participated in the Koffler Summer Arts Party, an annual week-long event for children who love music, dancing and art.

They were guests at the UJA Federation’s 2008 community campaign launch on August 29 at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel and even found time to spend a day at the Canadian National Exhibition, and travel to Niagara Falls.

Cohen said that the kids were so grateful for the opportunity to come to Canada and participate in this program.

“We’re giving these kids the opportunity… to have an exciting adventure where they can travel outside of Israel. This is an opportunity they would never be able to experience given the kind of life that they have.”

Milo-Manson stays on at Bloorview

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Dr. Golda Milo-Manson has been appointed to a second five-year term as chief of medical staff at Bloorview Kids Rehab.

Bloorview, which is affiliated with the University of Toronto, is Canada's largest children's rehabilitation hospital. Its new, state-of-the-art building on Kilgour Road near Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre serves some 7,000 clients a year. The centre works with children who have a number of different disorders, including cerebral palsy, acquired brain injury, epilepsy, cleft lip and palate and a range of developmental disabilities.

Milo-Manson considers herself "fortunate to work here, and to work with these kids." Her life seems to have been a steady progression towards this position.

Raised in Kitchener, Ont., Milo-Manson originally became an occupational therapist. "I wanted to improve the quality of life [of kids with disabilities]."

While getting her degree at Philadelphia's Temple University, she met her husband, David Manson, now a pediatric radiologist at the Hospital for Sick Children (SickKids).

She realized that she wanted to be able to do more for children with disabilities, and went to medical school at McMaster University in Hamilton, She took her pediatric residency at SickKids, with subspecialty training in developmental pediatrics.

Milo-Manson says that while she recognizes that most of the conditions the children have can't be cured, what can be done is to "make improvements to their quality of life, giving them more independence, and their families an easier time."

Bloorview offers what she calls "longitudinal care," from diagnosis and early assessment to adolescence. "One of the hardest things is to say goodbye when the clients go on to adult facilities. We get really attached to each other."

Bloorview recognizes that the family is important to the welfare of the children. Parents play a big role, offering emotional, physical and therapeutic support, Milo-Manson says.

She is particularly involved with the initial diagnosis of the client. She recommends therapies, special treatments and equipment. For instance, she says, sometimes the body gets so spastic that the child can't sit comfortably. "There is a special pump that sends medication directly to the spinal cord. We even sometimes use botox to relax spastic muscles."

Customized seating, prosthetics and augmentative communication devices are some of the other services offered at Bloorview.

Many of the children have behavioural challenges in such areas as sleep, feeding, and taking or being given medication. Milo-Manson and her staff advise parents on how to handle these issues.

In addition to being a treatment centre, Bloorview is also an academic health centre. Milo-Manson's duties include "ensuring that the facility has the best medical care possible." She supervises a staff of 12 staff physicians, 17 consultants, and dental and pharmacy staff.

She is also program director for a developmental pediatric residency training program subspecialty of the University of Toronto.

"We have the largest training program in the province, yet we can take only two students per year," she says.

The subspecialty, she says, is not government funded, but relies for financial support on the Bloorview Foundation. This is in spite of the fact that the facility is accredited by the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, and receives international requests.

Bloorview enables the children to access a variety of services in one place, Milo-Manson says. "Orthopedic surgeons come here, as do ophthalmologists, neurologists and nutritionists. We can manage most of the children's needs right here."

But there are not enough trained specialists to deal with all the children and teenagers who need help, she says. "We want to see the program expand to meet those needs.

"Bloorview is excellent now. We are setting the standard for the best training."

New program for Jewish children with autism

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Puzzle Pieces Ltd., a one-year-old behaviour therapy and social skills development organization for children with autism, is launching a new social skills group for Jewish children.

"We have so many families tell us they couldn't find an appropriate place for their children to learn about their heritage," said Puzzle Pieces founder and executive director Jen Atlin.

"Many of the children I deal with, because of the challenges they face, are lacking social skills. First, we have to ensure that they have the social niceties and know how to interact in social situations," she said.

She gives skills like learning not to interrupt, standing up for and asserting oneself appropriately, as examples.

"Once they have these, we want to be able to give these children the knowledge of Jewish culture and tradition, as well as behaviour at the seder table and behaving appropriately in shul."

Atlin, who has been working with children with autism since the age of 15, graduated from McGill University on May 31, 2006 and opened Puzzle Pieces the next day.

She has grown the organization to include 15 therapists and about 100 families. Atlin estimates that some 30 to 40 of these families are Jewish.

Puzzle Pieces serves children from diagnosis (which is generally made when the child is between 18 months and 2.5 years of age) until age 12.

Puzzle Pieces currently runs one-on-one programming during the week and weekend group social skills sessions. The Jewish social skills program, the curriculum of which will revolve around Jewish holidays, is unique in focus, Atlin said, adding that it is the only one of its kind she knows of in Toronto.

Atlin said Puzzle Pieces in general focuses on three things: applied behaviour analysis, verbal behaviour and social skills.

Applied behaviour analysis, also known as ABA or intense behavioural intervention (IBI), involves teaching autistic children skills like tying shoes or reading by using small steps taught in a highly structured way.

Atlin said Puzzle Pieces' goal is to help the children make enough progress to enable them to integrate into the school system and interact with other children.

"I always say to parents that if I do my job well, the next time you'll see me [may be] at your child's bar or bat mitzvah or high school graduation," she said.

And Atlin is excited about the possibilities of the new program for Jewish children.

"I'm looking forward to it because we've seen the success of our other program," Atlin said of the new group.

"We know that if these kids can learn in an environment that's designed for them to thrive, they have infinite potential. Growing up, my Jewish culture was important to me. If I can create that for other kids, I'd love to."

The successes of Puzzle Pieces that Atlin described were anecdotal. She gave a recent example of two children who barely spoke when they started coming to Puzzle Pieces, but later independently exchanged phone numbers and made plans to see each other outside of the program.

Jonathan is a six-year-old boy who has been working with Atlin since 2005. (All names have been changed to protect the families' privacy.)

He has pervasive developmental disorder not otherwise specified (PDD-NOS), one of five autism spectrum disorders, which include autistic disorder and Asperger's syndrome. Jonathan's father, Samuel, said Jonathan's PDD-NOS is likely to evolve into Asperger's later on.

Samuel credits Atlin with revolutionizing the team of specialists who help Jonathan outside of her program.

"Teams can include psychologists, occupational therapists – there's bags of people with all different skills and abilities," said Samuel. "Jen has shown an amazing ability to interact with all members of the team and take over from me the co-ordination of the team."

Samuel added that one of the hardest parts of co-ordinating a team and dealing with a child like Jonathan can often be the stress level of the parents, which he said Atlin manages incredibly smoothly.

Samuel and his wife also have a younger daughter who does not have any "additional needs," as Atlin terms them, but accompanied her brother to the Saturday afternoon social skills group he used to attend.

"We're overjoyed with the fact that our four-year-old has access to the special needs community. Such great teachers as Jen and her staff can't help but make her more sensitive to others' needs in the long term," Samuel said.

He added that his biggest fear for his son is that one day, he will no longer be a little boy, and there need to be services available for the specific needs of older children and adults.

"I really like to see service providers in this community reaching out beyond cute little kids, because that's where we're headed. It's so simple and it's so hard to do."

Atlin recognizes this need and said Puzzle Pieces will look into expanding in the future. Currently, she said, they will not take teenagers, but also won't discharge a child as he or she ages.

"Once kids are with us and we watch them grow, we will help them integrate into the workforce when the time comes."

Holiday Food Ideas

Pomegranates and apples for Rosh Hashanah

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

It has been revered since biblical times as a symbol of fertility, good health and immortality. Celebrated by King Solomon in the Song of Songs, this tangy, many-seeded fruit with its crimson-hued, leathery shell was abundant in the Garden of Eden and is even thought by some scholars to have been the real "apple" that tempted Eve.

For the Jewish people, the pomegranate has special significance on Rosh Hashanah as one of the special foods that serve as auspicious omens for the year to come.

"The pomegranate is a powerful visual and sensory omen that we eat during the holiday time to remind us of the way we're supposed to act," said Laura Frankel, author of Jewish Cooking for All Seasons (Wiley) a joyful, accessible celebration of Jewish cooking throughout the year.

"The seeds of the pomegranate supposedly add up to 613, if you took the time to count," she said, "which represent the mitzvot of the Torah that you're supposed to do. Well, the story is 613. Who knows!"

For many people, pomegranates, plentiful as fall begins, also serve as the new fruit of the season, which we traditionally eat on Rosh Hashanah. But for Frankel, chef and co-owner of the acclaimed Chicago restaurant Shallots, pomegranates are her "secret weapon," and she uses the fruit and its molasses year round. (Pomegranate molasses, also called "paste," can be found in Middle Eastern markets or at www.sadaf.com.)

"Here at the restaurant we make martinis out of pomegranates," she noted. "They are so plentiful, tasty and fun. If you get a good one, it has the most perfect flavour of tartness and sweetness on your tongue. Pomegranate molasses corrects any kind of issues I'm having with a sauce. If it's too spicy or tart, it will fill in the cracks. It gives fish, chicken or meat that glazy finish and looks beautiful and shiny. Now if they only had pomegranate lipstick!"

Another omen for Rosh Hashanah is the apple, which we dip in honey as we ask God for a sweet year. "It's not just a childhood simple thing," Frankel explained. "You're supposed to take the sweetness into your mouth, your mind, your lips, and then act that way as well." Frankel offers a duo of baked apples for the holiday, one sweet with honey, dates and apricots, the other savoury with shallots and herbs, what she calls the "perfect side dish."

"The savoury apples have just the right amount of sweetness and are great with poultry," she noted.

The book is divided by season, and Frankel's passion for fresh, locally grown, organic produce is infectious. "Each ingredient that goes into the pot should be delicious unto itself," she writes.

Cookbook's author honors traditions while updating them

Autumn is her favourite time of year to cook. "There's still hanging over a little bit of summer, but fall is far more interesting to me. In summer, you don't have to do much. You cut it, put it on a plate, add olive oil - and voilà. In fall and winter, you have to coax the flavour from the vegetables," like hard-shelled squash, beets and celery root. "These really big root vegetables you roast slowly until they're caramelized. Turnips start out stinking and weird and suddenly they're sweet and gorgeous."

What makes Jewish Cooking for All Seasons a kosher cookbook is its adherence to the laws of kashrut, but you won't find any substitute ingredients or faux anything here.

"We've become out of touch. Our produce is shipped from Bolivia to your table, and we don't know where it comes from," she said. "But kashrut is all about being in touch with food, nature and spirituality. You don't mix meat and milk because it is cruel to boil a kid in its own milk. Our religion specifically goes at food and tells you what to eat, even sometimes where to eat it. The table is supposed to remind us of the altar in the Temple."

For the holiday table, Frankel honours our long-held traditions while updating them with flavour and flair. "You don't always have to be pulling out the green bean casseroles with nondairy creamer for the holidays," she advised. "If your family loves matzah balls and brisket for Rosh Hashanah, there are lots of ways to do it. I don't know why Jews think of brisket as Jewish food anyway. In Texas, they barbecue it. But we're going to have brisket for Rosh Hashanah with the savoury apples. On another night, I might serve the pomegranate chicken with matzah balls. There are a lot of ways to put out a great holiday meal."

POMEGRANATE-GLAZED CHICKEN

2 chickens, about 4 lb. each, cut by your butcher into 6 pieces each, on the bone kosher salt and freshly ground black pepper olive oil

Glaze
olive oil
2 garlic cloves, finely chopped
1 medium shallot, finely chopped
½ cup pomegranate molasses
3 tbsp. dark brown sugar
1 tbsp. tomato paste
¼ cup chicken stock

Suggested garnishes
fresh pomegranate seeds
chopped fresh flat-leaf parsley

Preheat oven to 350. Season chicken pieces with salt and pepper.

Heat a large, deep sauté pan over medium-high heat and lightly coat bottom of pan with olive oil. Brown chicken pieces on all sides, in batches, without crowding. When pieces are well browned (drumsticks and thighs will take longer than breast and wing pieces), transfer white and dark meat pieces to two separate baking dishes.

Apples abound in Frankel's Rosh Hashanah treats

Make Glaze: Heat a small saucepan over medium-high heat, and lightly coat bottom of pan with olive oil. Sauté garlic and shallot until lightly browned. Add pomegranate molasses, sugar, tomato paste and stock. Lower heat to medium and cook, stirring, until well combined and glaze has thickened, about 10 minutes.

Brush chicken pieces with pomegranate glaze, and roast until cooked through and a thermometer inserted into thigh registers 160°F, 30 to 35 minutes for white meat and about 45 minutes for dark meat. Brush chicken with glaze halfway through cooking and again when it is removed from oven.

Serve chicken sprinkled with your choice of garnishes. Yield: 4 to 6 servings.

Notes: The glaze can be stored in the refrigerator, covered, up to 2 days.

BAKED APPLES WITH DATES AND APRICOTS

1/2 cup chopped pitted dates
1/2 cup chopped dried apricots
1 tbsp. pomegranate molasses
3 tbsp. honey
3/4 cup sweet white wine, such as Riesling
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
pinch of ground cloves
1/8 tsp. freshly grated nutmeg
6 large, firm apples, cored

Preheat oven to 300. Pulse dates and apricots in a food processor 10 to 12 times, until fruits are chopped and clumping together. You don't want them to form a smooth paste. Transfer fruit to a bowl and stir in pomegranate molasses, honey, 1/4 cup of the wine, and cinnamon, cloves and nutmeg.

Stuff mixture into cored apples. You should have enough stuffing to generously stuff apples and have some stuffing "pop" out of top of apples (I love this part, as it gets crispy on top).

Place apples in a baking dish and pour remaining 1/2 cup wine around apples. Bake apples until they are soft and fairly wrinkly, 30 to 45 minutes. Occasionally, spoon some of the wine and juices onto the apples so they do not dry out.

Serve apples warm or at room temperature with some of the cooking juice spooned around the apples. Yield: 6 servings.

BAKED APPLES WITH SHALLOTS AND HERBS

6 medium shallots, thinly sliced
1 garlic clove, chopped
1/4 cup chopped fresh flat-leaf parsley
1 tbsp. chopped fresh thyme
2 tsp. chopped fresh rosemary
1/2 cup dried cherries or cranberries
1/2 cup chopped dried figs
1 tbsp. pomegranate molasses
3 tbsp. honey
3/4 cup dry white wine, such as Sauvignon Blanc
6 large firm apples, cored

Heat a small sauté pan over medium heat and lightly coat bottom of pan with olive oil. Sauté shallots, stirring occasionally, until golden brown and caramelized, about 15 minutes. Stir in garlic, parsley, thyme and rosemary and continue to cook until garlic is tender, about 5 minutes.

Preheat oven to 300. Pulse cherries and figs in a food processor 10 to 12 times, until fruits are chopped and clumping together. You don't want them to form a smooth paste. Transfer fruit to a bowl and stir in shallot mixture, pomegranate molasses, honey and 1/4 cup of the wine.

Stuff mixture into cored apples. You should have enough stuffing to generously stuff apples and have some stuffing "pop" out of top of apples.

Place apples in a baking dish and pour remaining 1/2 cup wine around apples. Bake apples until they are soft and fairly wrinkly, 30 to 45 minutes. Occasionally, spoon some of the wine and juices onto the apples so they do not dry out.

Serve apples warm or at room temperature with some of the cooking juices spooned around them. Yield: 6 servings

Notes: Apples can be baked 4 hours ahead and kept loosely covered at room temperature.

From my healthy kitchen to yours

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Summer is almost at an end and the High Holy Days are quickly approaching. As usual, the big question on everyone's mind is what to serve. I love the holidays, but the usual fare is packed with calories and fat. Not this year. I'll be preparing recipes from my new cookbook Norene's Healthy Kitchen (Whitecap Books) to serve at my holiday table.

Here are some delicious dishes that are heart-healthy, can be prepared in advance and are adaptable to serve large or small families. You've been waiting a long time for my new book to arrive, and I apologize for the delay. I hope your family enjoys these dishes and they will become new traditions to serve at your holiday table.

I've also included many of my favourite cooking secrets and there are many helpful nutrition notes and lots of information about the glycemic index. The recipes are great for heart-smart cooking, for anyone watching their weight, and also for those who are on a diabetic diet. With 600 brand-new recipes to choose from, there's something for everyone! You don't need to sacrifice flavour for nutrition and there's no need to convert the recipes to make them adaptable for the kosher kitchen. It's all been done for you.

Wishing all my readers a happy and very healthy new year. From my healthy kitchen to yours, eat your way to good health!

DAPHNE'S FAMOUS CHUTNEY CHICKEN

My assistant, Shelley Sefton, shared this treasured recipe from her late mom's recipe collection. Daphne Zarenda's friends have been waiting impatiently for it so they could savour the special memories of this special lady who loved to cook and bake for her friends and family. Daphne – this one's for them – and you!

1 whole chicken (3½ lb.), cut into pieces
1 tsp. garlic salt (or to taste)
½ tsp. freshly ground black pepper
½ tsp. paprika
¾ cup apricot or peach chutney
2 tbsp. lemon juice (preferably fresh)
1 tbsp. brown sugar
2 to 3 tsp. curry powder
1 tsp. ground ginger

Rinse the chicken well and pat dry with paper towels. Trim the excess fat. Spray a large casserole dish with cooking spray. Season the chicken pieces with garlic salt, pepper and paprika. Place in a single layer in the prepared casserole.

In a small bowl, combine the chutney, lemon juice, brown sugar, curry powder and ginger; mix well. Pour the mixture over the chicken and mix well, coating it on all sides. (If desired, the chicken can be prepared in advance up to this point and refrigerated for as long as 2 days.)

Preheat the oven to 350. Bake the chicken, covered, for 1 hour, basting with the sauce every 20 minutes. Uncover and bake for 15 to 20 minutes longer or until the chicken is glazed and golden. Yield: 6 servings.

Recipe doubles or triples easily. Keeps for up to 3 days in the refrigerator; reheats well. Freezes well for up to 4 months.

218 calories per serving (without skin), 16.2 g carbohydrate, 1.0 g fibre, 19 g protein, 8.8 g fat (2.4 g saturated), 58 mg cholesterol, 216 mg sodium, 322 mg potassium, 2 mg iron, 32 mg calcium

Shelley's Lighter Variation: Use 8 boneless, skinless, single chicken breasts. Bake uncovered, basting occasionally, at 400 for 20 to 25 minutes. Juices should run clear when chicken is pierced with a fork. One breast contains 190 calories, 12.1 g carbohydrate, 0.8 g fibre, and 3.3 g fat (0.9 g saturated).

GRILL 'N CHILL ASPARAGUS

My assistant Cindy Beer makes this simple and delicious dish ahead of time on her two-sided indoor grill. Her guests and family love it. Cindy insists on using thin asparagus spears because she thinks they taste better. If you munch a bunch of fibre-packed grilled asparagus rather than nosh on noodles or other starchy side dishes, over time you'll be pencil-thin too.

2 bunches fresh asparagus (about 2 lb./1 kg)
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
½ cup raspberry vinaigrette (below)

Preheat an indoor grill. Soak the asparagus in cold water for a few minutes. Drain thoroughly and pat dry. Bend asparagus and snap off the tough ends at the point where they break off naturally; discard the ends. Place the trimmed asparagus in a loaf pan or shallow dish and drizzle with olive oil. Roll the asparagus around to coat all sides with oil.

Transfer the spears to the hot grill, close the lid and grill for 5 minutes or until the asparagus is tender-crisp. Remove from the grill and let cool. Cover and refrigerate for several hours or overnight.

Holiday fare that's not full of calories and fat

When ready to serve, transfer the asparagus to a serving platter and drizzle with Raspberry Vinaigrette. Yield: 8 servings. Serve hot or at room temperature. Will keep for up to 2 days in the refrigerator. Don't freeze.

122 calories per serving, 6.8 g carbohydrate, 2.3 g fibre, 3 g protein, 10.3 g fat (1.5 g saturated), 0 mg cholesterol, 26 mg sodium, 240 mg potassium, 1 mg iron, 26 mg calcium

Chef's Secrets

- Grilling tip: if grilling asparagus spears on an outdoor grill, lay them crosswise to prevent them from falling through the cracks or place them in a grill basket.
- Size counts: some cooks prefer large asparagus spears but these tend to be somewhat stringy and usually require peeling. Thin and medium-sized spears don't require peeling. Try to buy spears that are all the same thickness so that they will cook evenly.
- Weighing in: one bunch of asparagus weighs about 1 lb. (500 g). There are 16 to 20 spears in a pound, yielding 2½ cups cooked. Calculate 4 to 6 spears per person as a serving.
- It's in the bag: store asparagus in the refrigerator in a loosely sealed plastic bag. To keep it moist, first wrap it in a damp paper towel. It will keep for up to 2 weeks.

Nutrition Note

- Asparagus are high in vitamins A, B, and C, and they're high in folate, which is important for pregnant women and for cardiovascular health. Asparagus is also a good source of potassium and iron.

RASPBERRY VINAIGRETTE

If you keep frozen raspberries on hand, you can whip up this fruity dressing in about 30 seconds. It's excellent over grains or greens. For a real taste sensation, drizzle it over grilled asparagus. You'll razzle-dazzle them!

⅓ cup fresh or frozen raspberries (no need to defrost)
⅓ cup extra virgin olive oil
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar (or 1 tbsp. balsamic vinegar and 1 tbsp. orange juice)
1 tbsp. honey
salt and freshly ground black pepper

In a food processor fitted with the steel blade, process raspberries for 8 to 10 seconds. Add the remaining ingredients and process 10 seconds longer to combine. Transfer to a jar and store in the refrigerator. Shake well before using. Yield: About ⅔ cup. Recipe doubles and triples easily. Keeps for up to a week to 10 days in the refrigerator.

68 calories per tbsp., 2.5 g carbohydrate, 0.2 g fibre, 0 g protein, 6.5 g fat (0.9 g saturated), 0 mg cholesterol, 12 mg sodium, 4 mg potassium, 0 mg iron, 2 mg calcium

COUSCOUS, MEDITERRANEAN STYLE

Experience the fabulous flavours of the Mediterranean with this colourful dish. You can use regular or whole wheat couscous, or try the pearl-shaped grains of pasta known as Israeli couscous (or maftoul), which are much larger and more versatile than the typical Moroccan couscous. You can substitute the couscous with orzo (a rice-shaped pasta), bulgar or quinoa.

2 tbsp. olive oil
2 medium onions, chopped
1 red pepper, seeded and chopped
2 cloves garlic (about 2 tsp. minced)
1½ cups couscous
1 tsp. ground cumin
3 cups hot vegetable or chicken broth
½ cup raisins or currants
½ cup chopped dried apricots or dates
salt and freshly ground black pepper
½ cup chopped fresh parsley or mint
⅓ cup toasted pine nuts or slivered almonds

Heat the oil in a large, deep skillet on medium heat. Add the onions, red pepper and garlic; sauté for 6 to 7 minutes or until golden.

Stir in the couscous and cumin and cook for 2 minutes longer or until golden. Slowly add the hot broth and bring to a boil. Reduce heat to low, cover and simmer for 10 to 12 minutes or until the couscous is tender.

Stir in the raisins, apricots, salt and pepper. Sprinkle with parsley and pine nuts and serve. Yield: 8 servings. Keeps for up to 3 days in the refrigerator; reheats well. Freezes well for up to 2 months.

264 calories per serving, 43.7 g carbohydrate, 3.9 g fibre, 6 g protein, 7.9 g fat (0.8 g saturated), 0 mg cholesterol, 182 mg sodium, 345 mg potassium, 2 mg iron, 42 mg calcium

Couscous with Mushrooms and Chickpeas: Sauté 2 cups of sliced mushrooms with the onions, pepper and garlic. Instead of cumin, add 1 tsp. dried basil or thyme. Replace the dried fruit and nuts with 1½ cups of cooked or canned chickpeas, rinsed and well-drained. One serving contains 242 calories, 40.6 g carbohydrate, 4.5 g fibre, 5.6 g fat (0.7 g saturated).

Couscous with Sun-Dried Tomatoes: Omit the cumin, dried fruit, and nuts. In Step 3, stir in 1 tsp. Italian seasoning and ½ cup chopped sun-dried tomatoes, rinsed and drained. If desired, add ½ cup sliced pitted black olives. One serving contains 192 calories, 32.2 g carbohydrate, 3.1 g fibre, 4.8 g fat (0.6 g saturated).

New wines can complement your holiday dinner

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

A bevy of new and classic kosher wine choices will brighten any Rosh Hashanah dinner.

The wines featured for the holidays by four major Toronto wine agents are mostly from Israel.

Simcha Wines is showcasing two wines, a white and a red, both from Israel's Dalton Winery. The boutique winery in the Upper Galilee was established in 1995. Alex Haruni is owner and head winemaker.

The Dalton Safsufa Cabernet Sauvignon has been available since mid-August at the LCBO.

"It's a deep red wine, it has a lively aroma and flavours of wild berries, black current and mint with subtle vanilla undertones from the barrel," said Simcha Wines head of marketing Janet Klugsberg. Klugsberg said the red goes well with lamb, beef or other full-flavoured dishes.

Simcha Wines is also featuring the new Dalton Safsufa Sauvignon Chardonnay, which Klugsberg called "crisp and aromatic." The white wine has citrus, pineapple and tropical fruit flavours, and goes well with fish, chicken or dairy.

For more information contact Simcha Wines, 905-761-9022.

Carol Slatt is president of both Lorac Wines and Galilee Wines. The wine educator and consultant founded the two companies 25 years ago. This holiday season, they are also featuring a red and a white from Israel.

Testing a vintage as seen in The Spirituality of Wine by Tom Harpur, Northstone publishers.

The white is the Vineyards Select'D Emerald Riesling/Chenin Blanc, which Slatt called a "fresh, light, delicious, off-dry new wine perfect for holiday dinners and to enjoy on its own." It's available at the LCBO.

The featured red is already a popular choice, said Slatt. The Private Collection Cabernet Merlot, like the white, is a blend of two types of grapes.

"It's a rich red wine. It's perfect for all meats, for brisket, cholent, all roasted meats and chicken," Slatt said.

"The wines are great and I'm very proud to represent these two wines from Israel," she added.

She said her support for Israel has been recognized by the Israeli government and she has always been a supporter of the Israeli economy.

For more information, call 416-783-2516.

Graftstein Wines has also been in the industry for decades. Neil and Rachel Grafstein started the company in Toronto about 30 years ago and they carry more than 200 wines. Both are descendants of wine producers, and Neil's family's involvement with wine goes back ten generations.

"We promote Israel. They have really grown leaps and bounds in so far as not only size but also quality," he said of Israeli wines.

Grafstein Wines features many different wines for the holidays, only a few of which are discussed here. (For more information, contact 416-256-0440.)

Holiday wines from down under

The first wines the Grafsteins mentioned come from the Recanati Winery. The winery is located in Israel and is headed by Lewis Pasco, whose background is in winemaking, culinary arts and engineering.

Neil spoke highly of the red Cabernet Franc Reserve.

"It's brand new. We've never carried it. It's the first time they're making it with that grape. It's a fairly rare grape variety for Israel."

"It's a cabernet franc grape. You get different tastes and flavours. Each grape will have its own unique characteristics," Rachel added.

"The wine connoisseur absolutely faints when they taste it, and the total non-wine drinker will be swayed by it," Neil said.

Other Recanati wines include the white Sauvignon Blanc and the full-bodied red Petit Syrah-Zinfandel Reserve.

Grafstein Wines also carry a sought-after line from the Kibbutz Tzora Vineyards, located outside of Jerusalem in Beit Shemesh. The small winery headed by Ronnie James specializes in grapes grown in the Judean Hills.

Popular wines include Stone Ridge, a red blend of cabernet sauvignon and merlot, and the Ilan series of at least four different wines.

And for the non-wine drinkers, Grafstein Wines also carries an exclusive-to-North-America grape juice. Made in Kibbutz Sde Eliyahu, Bio Organic grape juice satisfies many customers' requests.

"You wouldn't believe how many people are looking for not only non-alcoholic, but organic [wine]," Neil said.

Mazel Wines is featuring two new wines for the holidays that come from further away than Israel – they come from "down under."

"Just in time for Rosh Hashanah – two kosher wines from 'Down Under' – and the opportunity for everyone to sample them at three wine tastings hosted by the LCBO at three locations, free of charge," the company said in a press release.

One wine is the Goose Bay Sauvignon Blanc, the first kosher wine from New Zealand. It comes from the country's famous Marlborough district. This white wine has citrus fruit flavours and a crisp texture.

The red Teal Lake Shiraz features cherry and plum characters with a hint of spice and chocolate.

These two wines are available for tasting at three LCBO locations on Sunday, Sept. 9: from noon to 4 p.m. at Bayview Village Mall (Sheppard and Bayview), Scrivener Square (Yonge and Summerhill), and the Smart Centre (675 Wilson Avenue).

Hooked on honey

By ADAM MENCELES
Special to The CJN

Traditional doesn't have to mean boring. Honey on Rosh Hashanah has, for as long as we can remember, been reserved for apple dipping and honey cake. Considering honey has been around since the dawn of bees, shouldn't we have endless resources dedicated solely to honey-related recipes and food items? That's right, we should.

If you're wondering where to find the sweet stuff, your search will take you worldwide. Honey is used around the globe in many cultures and religions, some of which use this nectar in ways we would have never thought possible. From Greece to Japan and everywhere in between, honey of all varieties has been added to sweet deserts and savoury dishes.

Curious about how to make this Rosh Hashanah a more eclectic one? Look no further. The following recipes will show you how honey can make this year extra sweet.

AD'S GREEK STYLE HONEY AND APRICOT GLAZED LAMB CHOPS

Lamb is a staple in many Jewish kitchens. Honey is a must-have on Rosh Hashanah. Apricots complement basically everything. These three powers combined now share one commonality – they become a dinner entrée. This is a very simple dish that involves minimal effort and few ingredients, but tastes quite delicious. I don't normally condone the use of sweet ingredients in typically savoury dishes, but in this case, it works like a charm. Just try it and you'll see that the honey and apricot don't take away from the flavour of the lamb, but rather complement it.

8 single lamb chops
½ cup honey
½ cup apricot jam
¼ cup olive oil
salt and black pepper to taste
2 cloves finely chopped garlic small pastry or kitchen brush

Preheat oven to 350. Season the lamb chops with salt and pepper. In a bowl, combine the honey, apricot jam, garlic and olive oil. Brush the lamb chops on all sides with this mixture.

Refrigerate for two hours to let the flavours combine. Place the lamb chops on a baking sheet and bake in the oven at 350 for 15-20 minutes or until your desired doneness is achieved.

Let the lamb rest for a couple of minutes before serving. Serves 4.

AD'S CHINESE STYLE HONEY-ROASTED ALMOND AND SAUTÉED APPLE SALAD

The idea for this dish is to create contrast in temperature, texture and flavour.

mixed greens or any variety of lettuce
2 apples
1 cup honey-roasted almonds
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
½ cup olive oil
½ cup red wine vinegar
¼ cup honey
salt and pepper to taste

Place lettuce in four individual salad bowls. Peel, halve, core and slice apples thinly. Sauté apples in a frying pan on medium-high heat in vegetable oil until golden brown.

Briefly warm the honey-roasted almonds in a 350-degree oven (about 5 minutes). Be sure to watch them carefully so that they don't burn.

Make the dressing by mixing the olive oil, vinegar, salt, pepper and honey in a bowl until evenly combined.

Drizzle dressing on the salad and top with sauteed apples and honey roasted almonds. Serves 4.

Serve your salads front and centre

By DAPHNA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

The main course is most often the star and rightfully so. Soup's a must, and fall vegetables offer plenty of choice, but the salad, the poor salad, often gets short shrift in the midst of all the frenzied menu planning and preparation around the High Holy Days. But there's no need to relegate it to second-class status. Grocery stores and markets offer an abundance of lettuces, and many salads can be assembled the day before, waiting to be dressed at the last moment. The recipes below are refreshing, with a hint of apples or honey or fall produce, as well as refreshingly easy.

ORZO SALAD WITH TOMATOES AND FRESH HERBS

1½ cups orzo (rice-shaped pasta)
3 tomatoes, yellow and red, cut into ½-in. pieces (1½ lb.)
6 green onions, sliced
1 green or orange pepper, seeded, cored and diced
½ cup sliced pitted oil cured olives, optional
¼ cup chopped fresh basil
¼ cup chopped fresh mint
¼ cup chopped fresh Italian parsley

Dressing
3 tbsp. sherry vinegar
1 tbsp. honey
2 tsp. Dijon mustard
½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
½ cup extra virgin olive oil

Transfer pasta to large serving bowl. Gently stir in tomatoes, green onions, green pepper, olives, if using, basil, mint and parsley.

In small bowl, whisk together vinegar, honey, mustard, salt and pepper. Whisking continuously, gradually whisk in olive oil. Pour dressing over salad, stirring gently until well coated. (Salad can be made up to 8 hours ahead. Bring to room temperature before serving.) Makes 8 servings.

ARUGULA, MINT AND APPLE SALAD WITH HONEY DRESSING

¼ cup sliced almonds, toasted
2 apples, peeled, cored and thinly sliced

Dressing
2 tbsp. finely minced shallots
2 tbsp. cider vinegar
1 tbsp. honey
¼ tsp. each salt and pepper
½ cup extra virgin olive oil

Wash and dry lettuce. Gently tear into bite size pieces. In large serving bowl, combine arugula, radicchio and mint leaves.

In small bowl, whisk together shallots, vinegar, honey, salt and pepper. Whisking continuously, gradually whisk in olive oil.

Pour dressing over greens, tossing stirring until well coated. Stir in apples; sprinkle with almonds. Makes 8 servings.

ROASTED VEGETABLE SALAD

2 sweet red peppers
1 sweet yellow pepper
2 zucchini
1 Japanese eggplant or small regular eggplant
1 large red onion
2 lb. asparagus, trimmed and cut into 1-in. pieces
¼ cup extra virgin olive oil
¼ tsp. each salt and pepper

Dressing
2 tbsp. balsamic vinegar
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 tsp. Dijon mustard
2 tsp. chopped fresh thyme (or ½ tsp. dried)
¼ tsp. each salt and pepper
½ cup extra virgin olive oil

Core and seed sweet red and yellow peppers. Cut into large chunks. Cut zucchini in half lengthwise and then cut diagonally into ½-in. thick slices. Slice eggplant into ½-in. thick cubes. Peel onion; cut in half, leaving root end intact; cut each half in eighths. Place all vegetables in large bowl; stir in oil, salt and pepper, stirring until all vegetables are well coated. Arrange vegetables in single layer on foil-lined baking sheet.

Bake in centre of preheated oven at 425 for 45 minutes, turning vegetables once. Add asparagus. Return to oven and roast for 10 to 15 more minutes until vegetables are tender and asparagus are bright green and tender to the bite. Let cool slightly (vegetables can be placed in bowl, covered with plastic wrap and refrigerated for up to 24 hours).

Ottawa dedicates new Hillel House

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — A ribbon-cutting ceremony recently marked the opening of Ottawa's new Hillel House, a three-story home where six university students will live during the coming school year.

Mitchell Bellman, president of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, told the assembled that the idea for such a house came up at a federation symposium last February.

"We gathered leaders of our community along with experts in Jewish demography and engagement and challenged participants to consider the big questions facing our community. We focused on the theme 'Will we have Jewish grandchildren?'" Bellman said.

Recognizing that a major challenge for the Jewish community is how to engage its young people, the federation sees Hillel House as a way to provide university and college students with a place to meet comfortably with other Jewish students.

"We want Jewish life on campus to thrive, and in this house, Jewish students will live, learn, make friends, debate issues and determine how they want to maintain their sense of Jewish identity while participating in university life. We see this house and the programs and activities that will be taking place in it as a training ground for future Jewish community leaders."

Ariella Kimmel, student chair of the Jewish Students' Association-Hillel (JSA-Hillel), will be among the house's first residents.

"Though we are few in numbers and spread out over three campuses, the members of the Jewish Students' Association have made significant contributions to student life in Ottawa," Kimmel said. "With this new house, we will be able to do more and we will better be able to connect with all Ottawa students."

The first six residents – three male and three female – come from Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa, and each will pay rent of between $500 and $600 per month.

Dov ben-Reuven, director of JSA-Hillel, said the residents will, like any other housemates, decide among themselves how to allocate household chores and responsibilities.

The house will also be used for a wide array of cultural, social, recreational and religious programs for Jewish students.

Ben-Reuven said Shabbat dinners and various other events will be held in the main floor common areas of the house, but the residents will have privacy in their upstairs living quarters, where there is also a small, private lounge area.

The purchase of the home was made possible through a donation by the Minto Foundation.

Ryerson students' union angered by Levy's statement

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Since Ryerson University president Sheldon Levy issued a statement against the proposed British academic boycott of Israeli universities, the Ryerson Students' Union (RSU) has been busy drafting a motion that calls on Levy to retract his statement.

In July, Levy issued a statement in response to the British University and College Union's (BUCU) proposed boycott of Israeli universities and academics that read, "As a university we embrace understanding, exchange of ideas, empathy and intellectual engagement. We do not shy away from controversy, difficult ideas, or disagreements over deeply held views."

But Heather Kere, the RSU's vice-president of education, said after concerned students learned about Levy's statement against the proposed boycott, they approached the RSU with concerns about "the process he took in order to come to the conclusion of approving of it, or not approving of it. That is when we looked into what could be done about these concerns."

She said that the decision was made to draft a motion that reads: "Be it resolved that the Ryerson Students' Union ask Sheldon Levy to retract his comment and; be it further resolved that a meaningful discussion on the issue involving consultation of students, faculty and staff occur before a public statement from the university issued."

Kere said that this motion has less to do with the statement he made, and more to do with the fact that he did so without consultation and debate, but she is still hoping that the president will retract his comments.

Sheldon Levy

She added that she isn't sure if they would have drafted a similar motion had Levy released a statement in favour of the boycott, "but because the basis for the motion was calling for discussion, that would be something that would have happened. All the motion calls for is discussion, so whether it was for or against, we still believe in the basic fundamental principle of democratic statements."

Kere said she is unaware of any school policy that says the president must consult with the student body before making a statement.

"But because this is an extremely contentious issue, that is why we are asking [for a retraction]… It is not a demand. All we can do is ask as students and say that this is what our membership is saying, this is what we're asking for," she said.

"Whether the discussion ends in the same sort of statement, that is yet to be determined. But it calls for the rescindment of the statements and to have a discussion before such statements are made."

But Jonathan Vandersluis, Hillel's city-wide student council chair and Hillel's past-president at Ryerson, suspects that the biases held by RSU members have more to do with this motion than anything else.

"From my experience, I would anticipate that they have their own views on the subject… It feels like that this whole motion is trying to silence dialogue and… trying to limit the open exchange of ideas and academic freedom," said Vandersluis, who is starting his master's in aerospace engineering at Ryerson this month.

"My personal belief is that it is more about other issues. It is probably their way of trying to get their message across without using the words that they actually mean," he said adding speculation that the real motive behind the motion is related to Kere's ties to the pro-Palestinian movement on campus.

But Vandersluis said he can't prove what conversations she had with pro-Palestinian campus groups prior to drafting the motion.

A published report said that the motion was drafted a day after Kere attended a meeting sponsored by a Student's Against Israeli Apartheid, but Kere denied that this meeting influenced her decision and maintained that the motion was drafted in response to students' concerns.

"To me, it is an attack on the core values of academics. The idea that they want Sheldon Levy to retract his statement would be, in a sense, to support the boycott, and to me, it is limiting the open exchange of ideas, which is not what university campuses should be about," Vandersluis said.

He added that he and other members of Hillel are still in the process of gathering as much information as they can about the motion and will react to the situation as it unfolds.

"We haven't taken any action yet. We're going to see how it plays out. We have a few ideas that we will act on depending on what happens," he said.

Mietek Weinreich ז"ל

At 80 years and one month, Mietek passed away peacefully on Saturday August 25th, 2007 at 1:30 AM at his home in Toronto. He was surrounded by his loved ones who shared in his passing. He is greatly missed by his wife of 56 years Tamara; his son Erez and family - his wife Li, daughter Danielle and son in law Tony; his daughter Pnina and family – her husband Alon, son David and daughter in law Taryn, daughter Adee, son Jonathan, and son Ave; and son Yoram and his family – wife Ronit, son Raz, daughter Maya, son Ely and son Ariel. He is also missed by his extended family in Toronto, New York and Israel as well as his many, many friends.

Mietek was born in Grojec, Poland on July 24, 1927 into a well to do family. Before the war, he had a privileged life and was dearly loved by his father, mother and sister. The war transformed his life and his future. Leaving his mother and sister in the safety of Nazi occupied Poland, his father took him and fled to Russian occupied Poland. He never saw his sister or mother again.

With the outbreak of hostilities between Russia and Germany, Mietek and his father made their way into Russia – moving with the advancing Russian front. Along the way, Mietek lost his father and was left an orphan fending for himself. With the strength of his personality he made his way to Tashkent in Uzbekistan where he survived the remainder of the war. There, he worked in the mines for a time, and then was an assistant to a wartime "merchant". Along the way, he caught malaria which plagued him for the remainder of his life. But he survived, on little more than guts and determination.

After the war, he made his way back to Poland to find what was left of his family. He reconnected with his cousin Luba – who helped him to stay in Poland. There he entered the orphanage Srodmorow. He became an ardent Zionist and joined Hashomer Hatzair – where he became a leader of his group establishing lifelong friendships

In 1949, he emigrated to Israel and settled on Kibbutz Revadim. He became one of the pioneers that built the country – plowing the barren fields and making them bloom. He was a devoted socialist and Zionist and believed in the ideals of equality and a homeland for the Jewish people. His love for Israel was intense and passionate. His friendships from that time were deep and long lasting. During that time, he married his wife Tamara, and had two children – Erez and Pnina.

In 1959, he and his family moved to Toronto. Here, he established a successful chain of retail stores that became Lumberking, Lumber City and Lumber Guys. He was a great marketer and had a love for merchandising and selling. In Canada, he had his final child – Yoram.

Mietek was involved in many charities throughout his life. He helped found the Anne Frank Foundation for needy children in Israel. He also raised funds for Yad Vashem in Jerusalem and Toronto. In later life, he was involved in JIAS where he helped many Russian Jewish immigrants to establish themselves in Canada. He was a member of Free Loan CASSA which helped give financing to many Jewish people in need.

In the past 47 years in Canada, Mietek created a great success – providing well for his family and giving the opportunity to succeed in their own right. A larger than life personality, Mietek was the center of any social gathering, business meeting or family function in which he participated.

He was an intellectual who mastered 3 languages and read high literature in all. He was generous and warm. He opened his home to all. Often it was said that visitors from Israel to Toronto first went to customs and then went to the Weinreich home. This was often true.

Mietek had a full rich life and a remarkable journey. We miss him dearly.

Donations in his name should be made to Baycrest.

CNN does a poor job explaining Jewish extremism

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

CNN recently (and repeatedly) aired the documentary God's Jewish Warriors, the first in a three-part series titled God's Warriors, anchored by Christiane Amanpour. The program was so sensational and so lacking in perspective as to leave its audience confused and ill-informed about the extent and impact of Jewish religious extremism.

Beginning with a reference to 9/11, the feature implies a moral equivalence between Jewish radicalism and the reigning terrorism today, which is overwhelmingly Islamist.

Downplayed was the fact that Israel's Shin Bet monitors Jewish extremists closely, that the state prosecutes offenders, and that the overwhelming majority of Israelis repudiate the heinous acts of extremists such as Baruch Goldstein, an extremist who killed 29 Arabs in a shooting massacre at the Tomb of the Patriarchs in Hebron in 1994. True, Jewish fanatics have their supporters and are dangerous, but as former Shin Bet head Carmi Gillon noted, they number only a few hundred.

However, the documentary makes them appear to constitute a far larger faction of both Israeli society in general and the settler movement in particular.

After the Six Day War, Israel attempted to return land

The feature's account of Arab-Israeli history omits essential basic facts that highlight Israel's long search for peace and security.

For example, Amanpour begins her account of Hebron's history in 1967, omitting the fact that Jews had lived there for generations. Many were massacred in 1929, and then totally expelled when Jordanian forces invaded the West Bank in 1948.

She also does not explain that in its 3,000-year history, Jerusalem was only divided by the Jordanian invasion of the nascent Jewish state in 1948, but was reunited by Israel during the June 1967 war. Similarly, she fails to note that, contrary to the Israel-Jordan ceasefire agreement following the 1948 war, Jews were forbidden to visit their holiest sites.

As well, Amanpour neglects to mention that after the Six Day War, Israel attempted to return land captured legitimately in an act of self-defence. The Arab League replied with the famous "three Nos": no peace, no recognition, no negotiations with Israel.

Amanpour relies heavily on former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, author of the very controversial book Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid, who insists that "no rational analyst" could deny that Israel's settlements are "the [Carter's emphasis] major impediment to peace." Yet no other "rational" expert, such as former U.S. president Bill Clinton, is heard from to offer a contrary opinion.

The Camp David talks in 2000 did not break down over settlements. They failed over then-PA president Yasser Arafat's rejection of the right of Jewish sovereignty in Jerusalem, and by extension in Israel itself, along with his insistence on the "right of return" of Palestinian refugees to Israel – an act that would spell the end of Israel as a Jewish state.

The basic premise of the CNN feature, that "Jewish warriors" (a phrase repeated ad nauseum) are the principal threat to Arab-Israeli peace, is false. This becomes evident during coverage of events in August 2005, when Israel unilaterally withdrew from Gaza, and 9,000 settlers left their homes, protesting, but without violence.

Opinion polls have shown that a majority of Israeli settlers would accept compensation if a genuine peace was brokered.

Furthermore, if the settler "warriors" have been such an effective force against peace, what accounts for the Israel-Egypt peace agreement in 1979, Israel's subsequent withdrawal of settlers from the Sinai, and, during the Oslo process (1993-2000), its withdrawal from areas in the West Bank? In the feature, these agreements are mentioned in passing, but seem to emerge out of nowhere.

God's Jewish Warriors is riddled with inconsistencies and contradictions that inadvertently prove, contrary to its own premise, that when Israel has the chance for real peace, it seizes the opportunity.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Local volunteers help preserve World War II bomber

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

An Avro Lancaster Mark X bomber plane built to fly during World War II is being preserved by a volunteer team at the Toronto Aerospace Museum.

"We're saving a piece of Canadian history which is representative of an era when people did unbelievable things," volunteer Paul Spiar said of the Lancaster, which is known by its FM104 serial number.

"It's incredibly important to keep this history and the stories alive."

Of the 7,366 Lancasters built during the war, 430 were built in Canada on the site of what is now Pearson International Airport. Some 4,000 were lost during the war, and today, approximately 20 remain worldwide, only two of which still fly.

The FM104 at the museum, located in Downsview Park, was built in late 1944 and flown to England in January 1945. It never saw action during the war.

The plane had a diverse career afterward, including a maritime reconnaissance role and various jobs with the 107 Rescue Unit of Maritime Air Command in Newfoundland, including work over water. Its primary role was search and rescue.

But in 1965, the aircraft, at that point belonging to the City of Toronto, was mounted on a plinth (a heavy base) on Lakeshore Boulevard as a monument to Canadian airmen who died in the war. For more than 30 years, the plane sat exposed to the elements, as well as to thieves and vandals.

"It was vandalized beyond belief. There were even homeless people sleeping in it," said Spiar.

Anything worth keeping as a souvenir was gutted from the plane's inside.

In 1998, Heritage Toronto decided to donate the plane to the Toronto Aerospace Museum.

The preservation process started then, and it's expected to take at least another 10 years to complete, and cost $750,000. The museum is shouldering most of the cost, which is offset by some donations and a grant from the Ontario Trillium Foundation.

Project manager Andrew Walz leads what he described as an "eclectic" group of about 17 to 22 volunteers on Wednesday evenings and Saturday afternoons.

About only 10 per cent have experience with aircraft, he said.

Walz said the FM104 is a preservation, rather than a restoration, project, because the group focuses on saving as much of the original plane as possible rather than making it safe for flight.

Plane will be on permanent display at museum

'We're saving a piece of Canadian history'

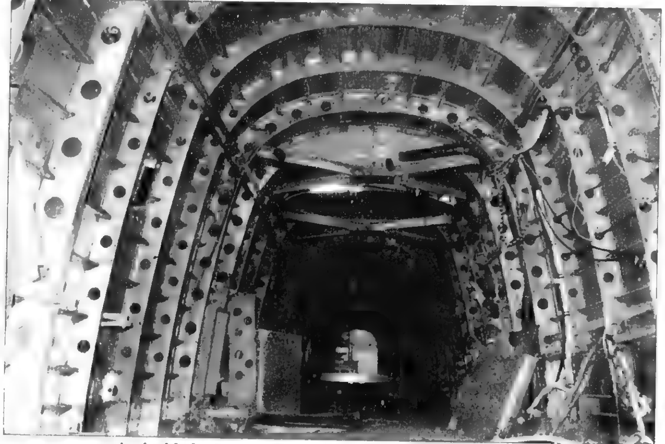
Spiar recalled spending hours removing and refurbishing the plane's original bolts. If the project's goal was restoration, the bolts would have been scrapped and replaced with new ones, he said.

"It won't run again. It's a museum piece, not a hobby," Walz said.

Spiar, who runs a clothing store, has absolutely no experience working with aircraft, although learning about history and aircraft is one of his hobbies.

He got involved with the project in 2000 when he heard about the plane's move and preservation.

"I talked to some of the veterans and I looked at this aircraft and realized what people did, and it makes me wonder if my generation would do what these people did," he said.



An inside look at the plane, from just behind the cockpit.

"I also feel privileged to work on this. I don't know anything about aircraft restoration. I'm not a mechanic. Hopefully, this aircraft is going to be around long after I've gone to dust."

Once the plane is finished, it will be on permanent display at the museum.

Spiar recruited his friend, Wilfred Mandel, to join the volunteer team in 2002.

Mandel also has no experience working on aircraft, but he does have a personal connection to flight.

His uncle, William Fisher, was a navigator on a Lancaster during the war. In 1948, Fisher volunteered to fly for Israel's fledgling air force. He moved to the new state at the end of August of that year, and in October, the plane he was on with five others crashed, and he died.

"I'm a real estate agent, but I thought it's sort of a link between me and my uncle," Mandel said. "He was only 25 when he was killed. He got through the war without a scratch, and he was only in Israel two months and lost his life there."

Mandel has enjoyed working on FM104, doing everything from scraping off old paint to working on one of the plane's four engines.

"My own observation is that our young generation does not have a real appreciation of what our [older] generation went through. Anything we can do to try and preserve it will help us all."

The plane is 69 feet long with a 103-foot wingspan. The inside floor was torched out to mount it on the plinth, and parts of the fuselage, or body, are extremely damaged.

"It was about two years away from falling off [the plinth] on its own," Walz said of the plane's terrible state before coming to the museum.

In addition to fixing the fuselage, major tasks in the preservation process include fixing the plane's four engines, one of which is almost complete.

Spiar, Mandel and Walz encourage anyone with any memorabilia, uniforms or Lancaster parts to donate them to the museum, which can provide a tax receipt. For more information, visit www.torontoaerospacemuseum.com.

Winnipegger teaches sculpture to Jewish, Arab youth

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Mia Feuer is a budding sculptor with a social conscience.

The University of Manitoba Fine Arts graduate (2005) has led sculpting workshops for Winnipeg inner city kids. And, in late July, she returned from four months in the Middle East teaching sculpture to Arab and Israeli youth.

"I have had an interest in the Middle East and the Arab-Israeli conflict for quite a while," says the 26-year-old. "I was inspired by my birthright [israel] trip four years ago."

Last fall, with the help of grants from the Manitoba Arts Council and the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, Feuer mounted a showing of her work.

Titled "The Land That Buries Its Children," the interactive exhibit focused on the Arab-Israeli conflict. The exhibition, Feuer notes, was very well received, with one publication ranking it among the top 10 best shows in Winnipeg last year.

Wanting to learn more about the conflict first-hand, Feuer travelled to Neve Shalom/Wahat al-Salam in April for a two-month stay. The community of 55 families, is located between Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

It was established 35 years ago by Arab and Jewish Israelis to try to prove that co-existence is possible, and it's the only community in Israel where Jews and Arabs have chosen to live together, Feuer says.

At Neve Shalom/Wahat al-Salam, the young Winnipegger spent her time facilitating sculpting and painting workshops in the village school and the youth club. She describes Neve Shalom/Wahat al-Salam as a wealthy community in a beautiful setting.

"Although the atmosphere is generally positive," she says of the community, "there are tensions that occur around certain holidays, such as Yom Ha'atzmaut, or when the Jewish Israeli youth are called up for army duty. But at least there is dialogue."

Mia Feuer

Through contacts at Neve Shalom/Wahat al-Salam, Feuer was able to line up workshops in several West Bank Arab communities – such as Hebron, Nablus and Ramallah – where she spent the last two months of her stay in the area.

She is careful with her words in describing the living conditions of the Palestinians she got to know.

"They [most of the Palestinians she came in contact with] live in very difficult conditions," she says. "In the Balata refugee camp, for example, there are 28,000 residents crammed into one square mile. They have nothing. I can understand why some of them choose violence. But most of them just want to live normal lives."

She says that the fact of her being Jewish didn't seem to disturb anyone in the West Bank community.

"When people found out I was Jewish, they welcomed me," she says. "Most Palestinians on the West Bank don't come across Jews in non-threatening situations."

What was scary for her was the ever-present sounds of violence. She recalls that in Nablus, for example, she could hear gunshots every 10 minutes.There was also a constant Israeli army presence and the streets were lined with demolished buildings.

Back home in Winnipeg, her father, Glen, says he had many sleepless nights while his daughter was in the West Bank.

Feuer was back briefly in Winnipeg in late July and early August before moving on to Virginia Commonwealth University, where she will be continuing her studies in sculpture for the next two years.

She says the school is the top-ranked university in North America for sculpture.

"I was really honoured to be accepted there," Feuer says.

She is also appreciative of being awarded the 2007 Mona Gray Creative Arts Scholarship by the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba. The $5,000 scholarship is awarded annually to a graduate of a Manitoba institute who is pursuing graduate studies in fine arts, music, theatre, dance, film, photography or creative writing.

After finishing her studies, she hopes to work as a sculptor and maybe a professor teaching sculpture at university. She would also like to continue to teach art to kids in war-torn areas.

Winnipeg CJA campaign gets off to low-key start

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This year, Winnipeg's annual Combined Jewish Appeal campaign kicked off this month without the hoopla of recent years.

For the past two years, the campaign began or ended with a by-invitation-only party at a downtown nightclub that featured interactive theatre and music intended to personalize for major donors what the money raised means to individuals and organizations in the community.

"Every year, we have to come up with ever-better entertainment," says businessman Ben Cohen, this year's CJA campaign chair. "We decided to take a break from that this year."

New this year will be targeted events and telethons, in addition to a community-wide "Super Week" telethon that started on Sep. 4, Cohen said.

"We will have mini-telethons with doctors calling doctors and lawyers calling lawyers, for example," he added. "That way, we will have different groups of people calling together rather than in isolation."

This year's campaign goal is $5.3 million, about $150,000 more than was raised last year, Cohen said. The target last year was actually $5 million. It was the 12th year in a row that the annual campaign has shown an increase over the year before and also exceeded its goal.

Last year, the federation raised an additional $2.2 million in emergency funding for Israel in light of the heavy destruction in northern Israel suffered during the Second Lebanon War.

"This year, we will be able to focus mainly on our local needs," Cohen said. "We still have a lot to do in terms of absorbing the many immigrants who have moved here in the past few years."

(While immigration from South America has virtually ended – about 100 Argentine Jewish families came here in the early part of this decade – the flow of immigrants from Israel, most of them Jews from the former Soviet Union, continues at a steady pace.)

The 2007 CJA Campaign mini-events include a top donors evening on Sept. 6 focusing on the needs of the community. Speakers will address the importance of a Jewish education, poverty in the Jewish community and the Grow Winnipeg Initiative, the federation's campaign to increase the size of the community.

Ben Cohen

On Sept. 9, the Rady Centre will host a CJA appreciation afternoon for families that will be open to everyone in the community.

On Sept. 10, the Women's Campaign Lion of Judah luncheon will feature guest speaker Prof. Mira Sucharov of Carleton University's political science department, whose topic will be "From Abbas to Hamas and Back Again."

On Sept. 17, lawyer Todd Campbell will advise participants attending a doctors division program about protecting themselves from malpractice.

On Sept 20, lawyer Florence Carey will speak to the financial services, lawyers and business division about charitable giving.

The last program, the "Plus Giving" event for the women's campaign on Oct. 11, will be an evening with U.S. comedian Joel Chasnoff.

The Super Week co-chairs this year are younger community members Steven Hyman, a lawyer, and Lindsay Sawyer, a community planner. Both are in their early 30s.

Sawyer became involved in the community two years ago through the federation's young adult division. She and her husband, Sam Fay, also took part in the federation's "Club Fed" young leadership development program.

Hyman is the longtime cantor at the Sharon Home, the community's extended care home for the elderly. He is also a "Club Fed" graduate.

Hyman and Sawyer worked together previously co-chairing a community bone marrow clinic last year.

London launches Melton adult mini-school

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

London, Ont., is getting its own Florence Melton Adult Mini-School (FMAMS) program, which will begin holding classes on Oct. 9.

This Sunday evening, there will be a celebratory and informational event at the London Jewish Community Centre.

The launching of the program, which will be a satellite of the Melton program in Toronto, is a "very significant" event for a community of London's size (about 2,800 people plus about 3,000 Jewish students at the University of Western Ontario), said Alan Nagus, a retired civil servant who – along with fellow retirees Fred Ball and Art Benjamin, and Sondy Taran, a mother of four – was part of a small group instrumental in getting the initiative off the ground.

"London will be, if not the smallest, then one of the smallest Jewish communities that will have been able to bring the Florence Melton program to the community," said Nagus. "For a community this size to be able to put this program on, we are very proud of that."

The FMAMS, which was founded in 1986, is an adult Jewish education program with a two-year curriculum that was developed at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. According to its website, it is the largest pluralistic adult Jewish education network in the world, with 62 mini-schools in 60 cities throughout the United States, Canada, England and Australia.

Esther Marcus, executive director of London's Jewish Federation, which is supporting the program financially and providing space for classes, told The CJN, "We were thrilled to be able to help bring Melton to our community, and as a pluralistic community, we felt that this would certainly fit into our mandate for education."

The community has many opportunities for people to take Jewish classes, she said, citing a program called JEM and the upcoming launch in November of the Jewish Learning Institute at Congregation Beth Tefilah, London's Orthodox synagogue.

Nagus told The CJN that the Melton program appealed to him because of its in-depth curriculum and worldwide reputation. He first investigated it about four years ago when he was trying to develop an adult education program at his synagogue, Congregation Or Shalom.

The FMAMS has five locations in Canada including Ottawa, Winnipeg and Vancouver.

Loretta Tanenbaum, director of the Toronto program, which is starting its seventh year, said that Melton teachers do not lecture, but rather students and teachers alike grapple with the text and share their interpretations with each other.

"All of the Melton teachers are open, and not afraid to discuss points of view other than their own," she said. "The classroom needs to be a 'safe' environment. The participants are told they can ask any question they want, and make any statement they want... Nobody is going to be put down, and indeed the people who come to the classes are coming from a variety of backgrounds."

The new endeavour is a program of the London Jewish Federation. It is funded by the federation, Canadian Friends of Hebrew University, and private contributors, Nagus said.

Benjamin, a lay Jewish educator who is active in London's Temple Israel, has been hired as one of three teachers, or facilitators, along with Avraham (Arthur) Brown, a professor at the University of Western Ontario, and William Klein, a dentist who is active at Or Shalom leading services and teaching Judaic studies. Nancy Pazner has been hired as director.

As of last week, 18 students had signed up for the program and another five had "indicated a strong commitment," said Nagus. The are expected to have between 12 and 20 students each. Both morning and evening classes will be available, and tuition is $495 for the year (one class per week).

For further information or to register for classes or this Sunday's event, call at 519-673-3310, ext. 103.

COMBINED JEWISH APPEAL LAUNCH: Michael Cape, general campaign chair of the 2007 Combined Jewish Appeal, and women's chair Sylvia Quint attended the launch of the 2007 Combined Jewish Appeal late last month in Montreal. Cape stressed that every Jewish child must have the opportunity to maximize his or potential, regardless of his or her socio-economic circumstances, including access to formal or informal Jewish education. "It is our responsibility to care for those who are vulnerable, whether because they are poor, or aged, or newly arrived in Montreal," he added. The campaign concludes Nov. 22.

Ex-minister urges Olympic boycott over Darfur

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Former federal cabinet minister David Kilgour called for a boycott of the 2008 Beijing Olympic Games to protest China's failure to use its leverage with Sudan to end the conflict in Darfur, as well as human rights abuses against its own citizens.

"In my view, shaming the government of China is the best hope of saving civilian lives in Darfur," he said.

Kilgour, a guest speaker at an Aug. 16 conference organized by Save Darfur Canada and the Institute for Public Affairs of Montreal, said China continues to protect the Sudanese government from blame because it's dependent on the African country for seven per cent of its oil imports.

Although China, as one of five permanent members, voted for the United Nations Security Council resolution adopted in July authorizing the deployment of a 26,000-member peacekeeping mission in Darfur, Kilgour said the motion was watered down due to China's demands and contains no provision to sanction Khartoum if it does not comply with the terms. The joint UN and African Union military and police forces are scheduled to arrive in December, a timetable that is "excruciatingly slow," he said.

China is Sudan's largest trading partner, and Sudan has benefited from $10 billion in receipts from China over the past decade, Kilgour said. China has also supplied Sudan with significant amounts of arms and poured millions of aid into the country, he added.

Kilgour, a longtime MP from Edmonton until 2006, was secretary of state for the Asia-Pacific region and, earlier, for Latin America and Africa, in the Chrétien government.

He said Sudan is currently not fully abiding by a peace agreement to settle a bloody conflict with the Christian minority in the south of the country that went on for years before the Darfur crisis began in 2003.

Kilgour also urged other means of putting pressure on China such as demonstrations outside the country's diplomatic missions accusing China of "complicity in genocide."

Kilgour and Winnipeg human rights lawyer David Matas are the authors of the Report into Allegations of Organ Harvesting of Falun Gong Practitioners, released last year in Ottawa and recently updated, which found evidence that the Chinese government is selling the organs of executed members of the banned group to those in need of transplants, including foreigners, for high prices.

Another speaker at the conference, retired Canadian general Lewis MacKenzie, said he's doubtful that UN-AU peacekeepers will be in Darfur by December and thinks that they will be ineffective once they arrive.

MacKenzie, who was commander of the UN protection force in the former Yugoslavia in 1992 during the height of the Bosnian civil war, said the planned Darfur mission is too small.

The region is about the size of Texas and that amounts to about one soldier for every 1.5 kilometres, he said. Put another way, MacKenzie said that's the equivalent of 24 soldiers for an area the size of Montreal, which, he pointed out, has 4,400 police officers to protect it.

"It's totally ludicrous to expect that number to control the situation," he said.

He said that the mission will also not have the communications infrastructure or the transport, such as modern helicopters, to be sufficiently mobile.

He noted only about 14,000 of the troops will actually be armed.

"This 'hybrid' force will be ill-equipped, underfunded and underpaid and that will lead to corruption [among the troops]," he said.

MacKenzie said that when he called for NATO intervention in Darfur three years ago he was labelled a racist. "They said I was suggesting the white man go to Africa and solve a black man's problem."

He criticized the UN's "glacial decision-making process" and the fundamental flaw of having five permanent Security Council member countries who each have the power to veto, which they will use if it's in their national interest.

"The Security Council is no longer capable of dealing with problems like this," and he suspects no national government is going to take the lead either, he said.

He called the Security Council resolution "a brilliant piece of international diplomacy that gets the permanent five members off the hook for a year.

"Khartoum loves this, that we just can't get our act together," MacKenzie said.

McGill University law professor Payam Akhavan, who was a legal adviser to the prosecution during the war-crimes trials at The Hague for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, said Darfur was a "preventable genocide" that points to "the moral failings of the international community to give meaning to the vow 'never again' made after World War II."

The Iranian-born Akhavan said that the Darfur crisis is "above all, a deliberate political choice that benefits someone in power. We have to send the message that crime does not pay."

He said the International Criminal Court identified 51 people in Darfur suspected of crimes against humanity, and two were recently indicted: the leader of the Janjaweed militia and a minister in the Sudanese government. The rest of the suspects' names have not been made public, he said.

Save Darfur Canada is an umbrella organization of more than 50 organizations affiliated with the Washington-based Save Darfur, which seeks to raise awareness of the conflict and to lobby governments and international bodies to act to stop it.

Executive director Tara Tavender, a former Concordia University student, said Save Darfur Canada will launch a national campaign in September to send 300,000 postcards to Prime Minister Stephen Harper calling for action on Darfur. It's also bringing the photo exhibition Darfur/Darfur to Montreal at the end of September. The show is touring 24 cities in 24 months.

AN OPEN LETTER TO OUR COMMUNITY
PREMIER'S REMARKS SHOULD BE RECONSIDERED

Dear Friends:

We are writing to you with a sense of anguish over recent remarks made by the Premier of Ontario on the issue of public education funding.

On August 22, the Premier was quoted as saying that including all qualifying faith-based schools in the province's publicly funded education system would lead to the unraveling of social cohesion. In the weeks since the Premier's assertion, many community members have called us to express their disappointment and dismay at such hurtful remarks that cast aspersions on Jewish day schools and schools of other faiths.

Our day schools teach respect for all members of society – not the opposite – and we encourage our students to strengthen the society around us through their volunteer work and their careers. Thousands of our graduates are important contributors to Canadian life and its celebrated diversity. They include medical researchers, social workers, professionals in the arts and many more. To suggest that our schools are divisive is offensive.

Regardless of one's position on public education funding, the debate must be conducted in an atmosphere of mutual respect. Therefore, we urge Premier McGuinty to reconsider his offensive statement and deal with the real issues at hand.

We believe that fairness is the primary consideration surrounding the question of public education funding. Ontario is the only province to provide funding for one faith-based school system to the exclusion of all others. While 650,000 students within the faith-based Catholic system are part of public education, 53,000 other faith-based students are excluded.

The status quo is both unfair and indefensible. The remedy, in our opinion, is inclusive public education – the inclusion of all faith-based schools that meet provincial educational standards – in the publicly funded school system.

Whether or not your children are among 11,000 attending day schools in the Greater Toronto Area, it is undeniable that Jewish day schools symbolize the acceptance of Jews and Jewish life within Canadian society. They strengthen our role within this remarkable country. Public education funding is a primary community concern for everyone. Let's insist that our Premier replace fear with fairness as the debate continues.

Stop pushing for Israeli concessions

By MOSHE YA'ALON

Opinion

After a few years of benign neglect, Israel is back on the itineraries of well-meaning foreign emissaries. Former British Prime Minister Tony Blair visited the country in July in his new role as special envoy of the Quartet (United Nations, United States, European Union and Russia) of Middle East peacemakers. In August, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice arrived.

Each visit concluded with a news conference at which promises of progress were made. But before any lasting on-the-ground movement toward peace can be achieved in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, foreign emissaries, as well as some Israelis, will have to shake off some long-disproved tenets of the conventional wisdom about the dispute.

Diplomats bring to Israel four main misconceptions. Primary among them is the idea that solving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a prerequisite for stability in the Middle East.

The region is riven by clashes that have nothing to do with Israel. For instance, the Jewish state plays no role in the conflict between Shi'ites and Sunnis, between Persians and Arabs or between Arab nationalists and Arab Islamists.

Moshe Ya'alon

The second misconception is that Israeli territorial concessions are the key to progress. The reality is that an ascendant jihadist Islam believes that it is leading the battle against Israel and the rest of the West. Given this dynamic, Israeli territorial or other concessions simply fill the jihadists' sails, reinforcing their belief that Israel and the West are weak and can be militarily defeated.

True, a majority of Israelis supported Israel's unilateral withdrawals from Lebanon in 2000 and from the Gaza Strip in 2005 in the belief that meeting Hezbollah and Palestinian territorial demands would nullify the cause of conflict between them. We now know the results: the Hezbollah and Palestinian reactions – concerted terror wars, kidnapped Israeli soldiers, rockets fired at Israeli cities – made clear that the Mideast's central conflict is not territorial but ideological. And ideology cannot be defeated by concessions.

Emissaries also still believe that "the Occupation" blocks agreement between Israelis and Palestinians. In the West, the term usually means the territories Israel conquered in the Six Day War in 1967. If the problem between Israelis and Palestinians were just the 1967 territories, and the solution were dividing those lands between the two sides – as proposed most recently in 2000 by then-Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Barak – the conflict would have ended long ago.

Instead, the heart of the problem is that many Palestinians – Fatah and Hamas, in particular – and even some Israeli Arabs use "occupation" to refer to all Israel. They do not recognize the Jewish people's right to an independent state, a right affirmed again and again in the international arena.

Finally, the well-intentioned visiting diplomats believe that the Palestinians want – and have the ability – to establish a state that will live in peace alongside Israel. But they are not being clear-eyed. The late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat established a "thugocracy" that never improved the basic living conditions of his people. Indeed, Palestinian unemployment and poverty are worse today than they were before Arafat and his cronies assumed power in 1994.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas did not take responsibility for the welfare of Gazans, which in part led to Hamas' electoral victory in 2006. Now confined to the West Bank after Hamas kicked his Fatah organization out of Gaza, Abbas has not moved to create a governmental structure.

A corollary of this fourth misconception is the belief that economic development can neutralize extreme nationalism and religious fanaticism, thus clearing the way toward peace and security. David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, had a term for such believers: "naive Zionists." Those who fit this description should demand that the Palestinians explain what they did with the $7 billion in international aid they received over the years.

Seven billion reasons for economic progress – so why did Palestinian mobs destroy the Erez industrial zone, where Palestinians worked and ran businesses for decades, on the Gaza border? Why do they attack safe roads linking Gaza and the West Bank? Why is the Palestinian economy in shambles?Shorn of these mistaken assumptions, the picture in the Middle East is disturbing indeed. No wonder emissaries hold on to them. So what to do?

For starters, western governments and their emissaries must refrain from pressuring Israel for territorial or security concessions, which at best produces only short-term gains and emboldens the Islamist terror groups.

Instead they should try to persuade the Palestinian leaders to commit to a long-term strategy premised on educational, political and economic reforms that would lead to the establishment of a civil society that cherishes life, not death; values human rights and freedom; and develops a middle class, not a corrupt, rich elite.

At the same time, these governments should set up an international fund that would offer Palestinian refugee families aid – say $100,000 to $200,000 per family – for their resettlement on the condition that their acceptance of the money would signify resolution of their refugee status.

Under no circumstances should emissaries attempt to open a dialogue with Hamas. For the sake of Palestinian society, Hamas and its ideology must be defeated. The Israeli-Palestinian conflict is not the most significant today; it's the battle between jihadist Islam and the West, of which Israel is merely one theater. To defeat jihadist Islam, the West must overcome the regimes, organizations and ideologies that support and feed it. Hamas is foremost among them.

The emissaries who travel to Israel must draw on their rich diplomatic experience, free themselves from misconceptions about the Palestinian-Israeli conflict and the petty politics that flows from them – especially the binds of political correctness – to lead us all toward freedom, security and peace. Anything else is mere meddling.

'Scandalous and shocking'

"It is clear from this week that the OIC is dominant and the Islamic agenda will dominate. The question is to what extent will the West and Louise Arbour… oppose any initiative that subverts human rights principles… and oppose any initiatives that unfairly singles out Israel or any other country," he added.

Irwin Cotler, Canada's former minister of justice, said the 2001 Durban gathering "became a conference of racism against Israel and Jews. We have to guard that Durban II does not go down that road. But regrettably, the indications are that Durban II may be proceeding in that direction, except in a more sophisticated way. In other words, the deligitimization of Israel may be laundered under the banner of anti-racism, proceed under the protective cover of the United Nations, invoke the imprimatur of international law, have the support system of NGOs and then result in a kind of moral imperative in respect to deligitimization."

Cotler said the evidence that is pointing to another anti-Israel gathering is both "scandalous" and "shocking."

The United Nation's planning committee includes Iran, a Holocaust-denying and genocide-inciting state, while the committee is chaired by Libya, itself a violator of the human rights of its own citizens and of foreigners.

"We need benchmarks and clear and authoritative indications" from Arbour, from NGOs such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, "that this kind of deligitimization will not go on," he said.

In Ottawa, meanwhile, Canadian Jewish Congress has already made its concerns known to Jason Kenney, secretary of state for multiculturalism and canadian identity.

"We opened a dialogue with the government through Jason Kenney to make sure the government was aware about what is going on and to urge Canada to prevent what happened at Durban in 2001, where the conference was hijacked by anti-Semites and anti-Israel groups who turned the whole program on its head," Eric Vernon, Congress' director of government relations, said.

"Instead of combating racism in its manifestations around the world, [Durban I] it turned its focus to Israel as the worst violator of human rights" and branded Israel as a racist inheritor of South Africa."

Congress' newly elected board of directors will meet later this month to put in place a strategy concerning the Durban II conference, he added.

In New York, Anne Bayefsky, senior editor of the watchdog Eye on the UN, said in a news release on the organization's website that in one of its first moves, "the UN committee did not have any trouble agreeing to a procedural move with discriminatory overtones. The first substantive session of the preparatory committee will be April 21-May 2, 2008. Why those dates? The Jewish holiday of Passover is April 20-27, 2008, and Jews the world over will now be inhibited from participating in a meeting supposedly dedicated to combating discrimination and xenophobia."

In an earlier news release, she criticized Iran's participation in the preparatory committee. "As a UN spokesperson against racism, Iran will invert totally the message and mission of the United Nations.

"The leading exponents of anti-Semitism, whether directed at Jews individually or the Jewish people and its state generally, continue to be provided a global platform at the United Nations," she said.

In another development, the Jerusalem Post reported that Israel and the United States had planned to keep a low profile at last week's preparatory meeting. Both countries were represented by low-level personnel who observed proceedings but did not participate.

Joining Libya and Iran on the bureau for the pre-planning conference are Cuba, Cameroon, South Africa, Senegal, Pakistan, India, Indonesia, Estonia, Croatia, Armenia, Russia, Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Belgium, Norway, Greece and Turkey.

The venue for the 2009 conference has yet to be determined.

Israel's economy booming, unemployment dropping

By MOTI BASSOK and TAL LEVY

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's economy is booming. The nation's gross domestic product expanded at an annualized rate of 6.6 per cent in the first half of 2007, the Central Bureau of Statistics announced recently.

It's the highest growth rate since 2000, a "bubble year," and pundits are astounded, since most of their predictions had been quite a bit lower.

Finance Minister Roni Bar-On said the strong growth stems from the government's economic policy. The government must sustain fiscal discipline and stick to its budget, he said, while it pursues its goals, including structural economic reforms set forth in the 2008 budget.

Second quarter GDP growth ran at 6.6 per cent in annualized terms, the bureau said, after rising 6.2 per cent in the first quarter, and by a steep eight per cent in the last quarter of 2006.

Last year was no slouch, either. In the first six months of 2006, Israel's GDP increased by 6 per cent, and in the second half, growth was 3.4 per cent.

Morgan Stanley had predicted a first-half pace of 5.8 per cent. Analyst Serhav Cevik, who covers Israel for the U.S. investment bank, said the newest figures demonstrate the brisk pace of actual growth.

Cevik added that the GDP gap – the difference between actual and potential GDP – widened from 6.9 per cent in the first quarter to 7.4 per cent.

Back to the first-half figures: the business product increased by 7.9 per cent in annualized terms, after increasing by 3.2 per cent in the second half of 2006 and by eight per cent in the second half of last year.

> The newest figures demonstrate the brisk pace of actual growth

Export of goods and services shot up by 8.3 per cent, investment in fixed assets increased by nearly six per cent and expenditure on private consumption per capita rose by 5.7 per cent. That last measure indicates an increase in the standard of living.

One of the most striking increases was posted by the hosting and food services sector, which grew by 17.5 per cent in first half of 2007, in annualized terms.

Another impressive sector was business and financial services, which posted 14.7 per cent growth.

In parallel with the good news about GDP, Israel also learned that unemployment fell to 7.7 per cent of the adult workforce. The Central Bureau of Statistics said that 37,000 people had joined the workforce during the second quarter of 2007, an increase of 1.4 per cent compared with the first quarter and an increase of 4.6 per cent against the second quarter of 2006. This raised the proportion of adults who work to 56.6 per cent of the potential workforce, from 56.1 per cent in the first quarter.

The improvement in unemployment figures began in the second half of 2004. The number of adults, defined as people over age 15, in the workforce climbed to 2.902 million in the quarter. Of these, 2.682 million were actually working, and 220,000 were unemployed.

The number of people seeking jobs for more than six months fell significantly, from 44.2 per cent to 38.9 per cent in the second quarter.

The number of people employed in full-time jobs, defined as working 35 hours or more per week, stood flat, but the number of people with part-time work increased by 4.4 per cent.

Many people do work, but would prefer to work more. Some 117,200 people work part-time not by choice, and are looking for more employment, the Central Bureau of Statistics reported.

On the bright side, that figure is down to 4.4 per cent of all employees, compared with 5.1 per cent in the second quarter of 2006. The number of involuntarily under-employed has been gradually receding along with unemployment, which peaked in the last decade at more than 10 per cent.

Chaverim

As we approach the High Holidays, it is an opportunity to gather with families and ask ourselves about successes and wrong-doings, about our actions and inactions, and the aspirations we had and those we forgot about because of difficulties.

While the Holidays are the same each year, each year we are different. Each year, we experience the Holidays differently.

Rosh Hoshanah celebrates our tradition. It's a reaffirmation of the Almighty's mercy, glory, and love. Yom Kippur is a time for repentance and a time to ask for forgiveness.

In these days of reflection, prayer and sorrow for our entire people, let's not forget the trying circumstances, the difficult times and the loss of life in Israel. Our support for the State of Israel will always be strong and everlasting.

May our prayers have a special depth, a meaning of passion and greatness. May our personal prayers, those for our families, for the Jewish people, for the State of Israel, and for the world be heard – and may we be granted health, prosperity and fulfilment along with blessing and peace.

My wife Maida and our family, join with the National Executive Committee of Maccabi Canada, our athletes, coaches, volunteers and the hundreds of people who support the development of young Jewish athletes throughout Canada, in extending sincere best wishes for a Happy and Healthy New Year.

Shana Tovah!

West Bank leaders meet with IDF

By AMOS HAREL
and AVI ISSACHAROFF
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — For the first time since 1994, all Palestinian security organizations in the West Bank took part in a senior-level meeting with their Israeli counterparts.

The security co-ordination meeting last week took place in the Israeli army headquarters in Beit El, near Ramallah.

Israeli participants included the commander of the Judea and Samaria division and the head of the civil administration in the West Bank.

All the heads of the Palestinian Authority's security organizations operating in the West Bank were present. They included the head of the National Security organization in the territory, as well as the commanders of Preventive Security, the police, the General Intelligence Service, Military Intelligence and the head of the civilian liaison office.

Security co-ordination at this level between the two sides occurred on an individual basis up until the outbreak of the intifadah in late September 2000. However, not since 1994 have all the Palestinian security services been present in a single conference with their Israeli counterparts, mostly because of the internal disputes among the competing security forces.

At the meeting the Palestinians asked the Israel Defence Forces to remove roadblocks, which they said would be an important gesture for the Palestinian people during the approaching holy month of Ramadan.

The Israeli representatives promised to consider a variety of measures that would ease the difficulty in travel faced by West Bank Palestinians. However, at this stage they didn't specify the roadblocks that would be lifted.

The commander of the Judea and Samaria division, Brig.-Gen. Noam Tivon, said that as long as there are no terror attacks and the security of Israelis is safeguarded, it will be possible to ease restrictions on the movement of Palestinians.

He promised that as Ramadan approaches, he will stress in his orders to the troops under his command that they should exhibit greater sensitivity to the needs of the civilian population.

The Palestinian Authority also asked to renew the security co-ordination between the two sides at the general staff level, and the Israeli officers said they would deliver the request with their recommendation.

The Palestinians also asked for an easing of restrictions on the ability of police officers to travel in different parts of the West Bank.

On this request also, the Israeli officers said they would consider it favourably as long as there are no terror attacks.

The atmosphere at the meeting between the two sides was said to be good, and the Israeli officers thanked their Palestinian counterparts for the role of the security forces in rescuing an IDF major, Razi Revah, who accidentally entered Jenin last month and was confronted by an angry mob.

Both sides were said to have expressed their satisfaction with the improvement in the co-ordination of security between them in the recent months, and the Israeli officers said they would make efforts to ease restrictions on the movement of cargo.

HOLOCAUST SURVIVORS: ARTICLE 2 INCOME CRITERIA CHANGES
Claims Conference Secures Compensation Program Expansion

The Claims Conference makes monthly payments to Nazi victims under the Article 2 Fund who meet certain persecution and other criteria and who have an income below a level specified by the German Government.

Following recent negotiations with the German Government, the Claims Conference secured amendments regarding the income that shall be considered when determining if an applicant is within the income limit. The income limit is generally the local currency equivalent of US $16,000 per year after taxes. The following are the new regulations:

- Only the income of the applicant shall be taken into account (not the income of his/her spouse) – this is a change from the current rule.
- From October 1, 2007 onwards, when determining whether the income limit is met, the following types of pensions will NOT be considered as income:
  - Old age pension (including: governmental pension, social security payments, occupational pension or retirement plans) and/or
  - Pensions awarded for reduction in earning capacity, for industrial injury or occupational disease, for loss of life or any comparable payment.

The changes are summarized above but specific details (including what payments constitute comparable payments) are still being discussed with the German Ministry of Finance.

Full eligibility details for the Article 2 Fund and further information about the abovementioned changes are at www.claimscon.org and further announcements regarding these criteria will be posted as they become available. Please note that the eligibility criteria concerning persecution history, also specified by the German government, have not changed.

If you believe that you may be eligible or are not certain if you are eligible, you should file an application now. Please note that under the current guidelines, payments to eligible persons are backdated to the later of October 1, 2007 or the date the application form is received. Application forms are available at www.claimscon.org. If you cannot access the form via the website, please contact your local Claims Conference office. There is no fee to apply.

Man dies of war wounds

One year on, the Lebanon war claimed its 159th Israeli fatality. Mohammed Salum, who was critically wounded in a Hezbollah rocket barrage that hit Haifa on Aug. 6, 2006, died Aug. 29 in hospital. He was 40. Salum, a lifeguard, sustained severe burns while trying to rescue relatives from a building that was set alight by a rocket strike. Three other people died in the incident. His death brings to 159 the number of Israelis killed as a result of the 34-day war against the Iranian-backed Lebanese militia.

Russia blamed for tension

A top Israeli official blamed recent tensions with Syria on Russian interference. Defence Ministry policy chief Amos Gilad said Russia, a chief arms supplier to the Damascus regime, helped fuel speculation that Israel and Syria could go to war this summer. "During a certain period, the Russians did indeed contribute to the Syrians thinking that Israel wanted war," Gilad told Army Radio. "I think they've stopped doing that. The Syrians do not intend to launch a war against Israel, and Israel certainly does not intend to launch a war against Syria." Gilad spoke after being asked about a Ma'ariv report that Russia had sought to stoke Syrian war fears in order to clinch a large defence deal. Syria is believed to have recently bought advanced Russian weaponry such as anti-aircraft missiles.

Press Hezbollah: envoy

A UN envoy deplored Hezbollah's failure to provide proof that two Israeli soldiers in its custody are alive. Michael Williams, the UN envoy to the Middle East, told the UN Security Council that he tried and failed to find out what befell Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev after they were snatched by the Lebanese militia in a July 2006 raid across Israel's border. "I have to say with deep regret personally – because I have made very considerable efforts in this regard – that more than 13 months after their abductions, we still cannot establish proof of life," Williams said, adding that nations with ties to Hezbollah should press the group on the matter. An Israeli military probe has determined that Goldwasser and Regev, both reservists, were likely wounded during their abduction and may have been killed. Hezbollah, which wants to repatriate the soldiers in exchange for a mass release of Arab prisoners by Israel, has refused to provide any preliminary information.

Teen Gaza bomber nabbed

Israeli troops captured a teenaged would-be suicide bomber in Gaza. Military officials said ground forces operating against Palestinian rocketeers in northern Gaza last week were tipped off that they would be targeted by a suicide bomber. The soldiers were approached last week by a 15-year-old boy who behaved suspiciously. They overpowered him and found two bombs in his bags primed for detonation. The military said Palestinian terrorists often resort to using children in expediting attacks.

Children killed by accident

Three Palestinian children were killed in Gaza on Aug. 28 by fire directed at them by the Israel Defence Forces. The Israeli soldiers could not distinguish that the "unidentified movement" near Qassam rocket launchers in Beit Hanoun were only children playing, an army probe determined. The video footage of the incident reportedly shows the children – who appear as figures whose age can't be determined – approaching the launchers and then moving back in a way that could be seen as suggesting they were loading the launchers with rockets. The IDF expressed sorrow for the deaths.

Hamas eyes new attacks in bid to undercut peace negotiations

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

In the run-up to the American-initiated Middle East peace parley in November, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas are accelerating efforts to reach an agreement on the principles of a final peace deal.

At the same time, however, Hamas is aiming to derail the process with a new wave of terrorist strikes and rocket attacks.

Analysis

Olmert and Abbas want to be able to present an agreement of principles to the peace conference in order to give its deliberations real substance. In parallel, Israel and the Palestinians are working on co-operative economic projects that could improve the peacemaking climate and underpin any future peace deal.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas at their meeting last week in Jerusalem [Israel Sun photo]

The thinking is that if there is a serious Palestinian agenda, the conference will be able to draw major players like the Saudis and jump-start a wider Israeli-Arab process based on the Arab League peace plan. The proposal calls for the full normalization of ties between Israel and all 22 Arab states in return for an Israeli withdrawal from all Arab territory captured in 1967.

But there are a number of obvious snags. For example, what about the Golan Heights? Would Israel be expected to return them to Syria even though Syria, because of its close ties to Iran, probably won't even be invited to the conference?

Worse, Hamas radicals have made it clear that they are determined to launch a new campaign of terror to undermine progress between Israel and the Palestinian Fatah moderates. Moreover, what kind of Palestinian state could be established with the fundamentalists still in control in Gaza?

Olmert and Abbas have met several times in the past few weeks to discuss core issues such as borders, Jerusalem and refugees. What seems to be shaping up is an agreement that lays out principles for a territorial settlement in two stages and a timetable for transition from stage one to stage two.

In stage one Israel withdraws from the West Bank up to the separation barrier after a period of quiet during which the Palestinian Authority exhibits firm control of security. In stage two Israel pulls back to lines closer to the 1967 borders and compensates the Palestinians on a one-to-one basis for settler land it annexes.

One of the ideas for compensation is to include land used to connect the West Bank and Gaza over Israeli territory. In stage two, the Palestinians declare a state in the West Bank and Gaza, even if Hamas is still in control there. The idea is to come to the November summit with an agreement in principle on these issues and to continue refining the details in subsequent talks.

Clearly, though, the plan would start going into effect only after a credible ceasefire has been established.

That is precisely what Hamas will do its best to prevent. The last thing Hamas wants is for its secular Fatah rival to get credit for pulling off a peace deal with Israel and then come under pressure to comply.

According to the Shin Bet security service, the Damascus-based leadership of Hamas has ordered the organization to launch a new campaign of suicide bombings against Israeli targets in the West Bank to show Israelis that Abbas' Fatah cannot keep the peace and therefore is incapable of cutting a peace deal.

Israel intelligence anticipates that in an effort to destabilize the situation further, Hamas also will launch Qassam rocket attacks from Gaza. Palestinian militants have been firing Qassams at Sderot and other nearby towns and villages on a regular basis, but Hamas has not yet joined in. If it does, the Israelis expect a significant increase in the bombardments, which could lead to a major Israeli incursion into Gaza to stop it.

Some Israeli strategists say that is precisely what Hamas, which has been smuggling unprecedented quantities of arms into Gaza, would like to see – a standoff in Gaza in which the Israeli army is forced to take heavy casualties.

Meanwhile, Israel and moderate Palestinians in the West Bank are proceeding with their peacemaking efforts as if the Hamas threat does not exist. In addition to the effort to shape a final peace deal, they are working seriously on economic plans to help create conditions for a sustainable peace. One of the plans is based on a Japanese initiative dubbed "the Corridor for Peace and Prosperity."

In a meeting at the Intercontinental Hotel in Jericho in mid-August, the foreign ministers of Israel, the Palestinian Authority, Jordan and Japan enthusiastically backed the "peace corridor" idea. The initiative envisages the establishment of an agro-industrial park in the Greater Jericho area, with a mechanism to distribute the produce through Jordan to the wealthy Gulf states. The produce and goods would be transported across the Jordan River to a distribution center on the Jordanian side.

As part of the centre, the Jordanians want a new airport for same-day conveyance to the Gulf states and other countries worldwide.

The Japanese have identified agriculture and agro-industry as a potential "driving force for sustainable economic development in the emerging Palestinian state," and see in this kind of co-operative venture a way of laying the foundation for a lasting peace.

Since the renewal of the peace dialogue between Israel and moderate West Bank Palestinians in June, an abundance of ideas have been broached to help the Palestinians create the basic infrastructure for viable statehood. Israeli officials welcome the new energy and see it as a means of underpinning an Israeli-Palestinian peace.

"For stable peace you have to have a Palestinian state that is successful," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said. "A failed Palestinian state would be a recipe for further violence."

Indeed, Israel is drawing up plans to help modernize Palestinian infrastructure and urban development. Officials say Israel will be prepared to do as much as the Palestinians want, but will not force itself on them. The Israelis say they intend to work closely with former British Prime Minister Tony Blair, the special Quartet envoy, who is due back in the region in early September.

Looking at the West Bank scene, chances for an Israeli-Palestinian peace have never seemed better; in Gaza they have never seemed worse. And, it seems, whether the American summit in November actually boosts Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking will depend on the outcome of the internal Palestinian struggle.

Jsport hits a grand slam

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Mattea Wintre is all about combining two things – sports and Jews.

A leader and participant in numerous Taglit-birthright israel trips, she wanted to find a way to continue and expand on the camaraderie achieved by Jewish youth on those trips after they returned to North America.

So when the 27-year-old Toronto kinesiologist and Parks and Recreation Ontario employe[illegible]ried to join a co-ed Jewish sports league in 2006, she was disappointed because none seemed to exist.

"I was rather disappointed in the post-programming aspects [of birthright]," Wintre told The CJN.

Upset but undeterred by the lack of pre-existing co-ed Jewish leagues in the city, she founded one of her own, calling it Jsport.

Last summer, Wintre organized and equipped a four-team, 40-player summer softball league th[illegible] ran from May to September, composed mainly of former birthright participants, and complete with an awards ceremony and end-of-season banquet.

And when summer was over, she organized a winter dodgeball league that ran from January to April at a north Toronto high school gym.

Now in its second year, Jsport, "Toronto's only co-ed Jewish sport league for people aged 18-plus" as Wintre advertises it, has grown in size from four teams to six (including dodgeball). About 100 people come out Wednesday nights to Toronto's June Rowlands Park, at Davisville Avenue and Mount Pleasant Road, to play some competitive softball, kibbitz and, most importantly, renew old friendships and discover new ones.

Though Wintre admits that what has happened is that the league has become a place where the average age is 25.

In essence, what Wintre has done is cultivate a quasi-social club for young Jewish professionals in Toronto. After each game, the players adjourn to a local restaurant or bar to swap stories, vent about work and imbibe a pint of beer or two.

It's become a league of friends – everyone appreciates Wintre's hard work and players are missed when they don't show up.

"My grandmother passed away two weeks ago and I couldn't be here to organize the game, but everyone called me to ask what happened and where I was," Wintre said.

The league receives some exposure via the Canada Israel Experience birthright Alumni Newsletter. Aside from that, Wintre procures all the equipment and leases the softball diamond from the city.

Oh yeah, and she's also the league's only umpire.

"I do it all," she said, laughing. "But we're growing and soon [league members] will want more out of this."

Wintre believes she'll have a pleasant problem on her hands when the softball league reconvenes next summer.

"I'm a bit concerned right now because we keep expanding and generating more and more interest," she said. "And right now, all I have [is the one softball field]. I plan on expanding and have thought about what to do."

She's managed to delegate certain responsibilities though, such as assigning team captains who communicate with their own teams by e-mail and ensure a prompt gathering for the 7 to 10 p.m. games.

As it stands, players show up looking like a rag-tag group, without uniforms, caps or helmets and wearing an assortment of sweatpants, shorts and serviceable running shoes.

All fees collected by Jsport go back into the league to procure bats, balls, base pads and pay for the baseball park permits.

This year, Wintre charged $100 per person – $1350 per team – to join the league. She keeps none of it for herself; it all goes for operational costs.

"I love doing it, but it'd be great to get some sponsorship for the league for next year. I get no financial support from [any Jewish community organization]," she said. "I organized this league because I want to play, too. But it's great to see all these people participating."

Wintre says she hopes her efforts to start and maintain Jsport are proving to any naysayers out there that there is indeed a vital, young Jewish population ready to move beyond just sharing a love of prior Israel experiences, such as those who embarked on birthright trips together, and fostering a new love for one another and shared Jewish experiences in North America.

To her, anyone contending that post-birthright program sustainability results are disappointing are off base.

"This is a Jewish, social, recreational league," Wintre said. "This was a good market to target. Everybody wants to join."

Wintre has been so amazed at the response to her league, she's now thinking of its future in a big way.

"I don't see why we couldn't [spread] Jewish continuity in this way... nationally," she said. "Anything's possible. I'd be into that. This is my life, my passion."

The 2007 Jsport softball playoffs begin this week with the championship game next Wednesday. The league will then switch to dodgeball this January.

The Spa at The Inn at Manitou

Spa Life

By KATHRYN
KATES

The Aromamineral Golden Spa Treatment and the Aromafructus Belladone Contouring Treatment are the newest signature treatments offered at The Spa at The Inn at Manitou, the five-star Relais & Chateaux resort.

The resort is located 20 minutes from Parry Sound on Lake Manitou-wabing.

The Belladone is a treatment that relaxes and contours using natural poppy flower seeds as its main ingredient.

The Golden Spa is a bath treatment that begins with a scrub. Then after a hydrotherapy tub, you are massaged with desert flower oil and a gold sublime liquid. The treatment ends with a dusting of gold powder. It is an anti-inflammatory treatment that has sedative and relaxation properties.

For both the Belladone and Golden Spa treatments, products used are by Fleur's from France.

"All our signature treatments are new this year. We've upgraded them from last year," says Deborah Thomas, the spa director and one of six highly trained therapists from around the world.

"Last year, we had signature treatments that had become very popular all over North America, like the Vichy Waterfall and the La Stone Therapy, which we still offer, but we decided to revamp our signatures by bringing in the Golden Spa Bath and the Bella Dona Wrap," said Thomas, who hails from England. She has worked at the resort for the last six seasons.

The 37-year-old resort has always offered spa services in one form or another – beginning with massage only in the early years. Now the spa boasts of 10 treatment rooms decorated in light earth tones with white trim, soft eclectic furnishings, including light wicker with muted patterned cushions, and Grecian artwork adorning the walls. The entrance of the spa has a retail area. Behind the reception desk is a cascading waterfall that relaxes you from the moment you arrive. The spa clientele is nearly half male.

The full-service spa, located in the basement of the main Relais & Chateaux building, offers customized facials; luxury manicures and pedicures; waxing; eyelash tinting; body treatments, including a cellulite treatment; and an array of massages, including Thai massage.

Thomas, one of three therapists trained in Southeast Asia, says Thai massage is a cross between yoga and Shiatsu massage and increases flexibility.

"A number of packages are offered, including the most popular called The Ultimate Spa, which includes a 30-minute massage of the neck, shoulders and back, a Distress for Success Facial, and an express manicure and pedicure," Thomas says.

"There is also a package for our non-guests that includes a morning of your choice of two 50-minute treatments, a lunch on the patio and a manicure and pedicure to top off your afternoon."

The products used in the spa and retailed to guests include Darphin from France and Oxygen from Canada.

The 35-room resort is pet friendly. The resort offers yoga, and has both tennis and golf academies. At the golf academy, there are target greens, putting greens and a driving range. Next to The Inn at Manitou and available to guests is a Tom McBroom golf course called The Ridge at Manitou.

Guests can also try the complimentary biking, canoeing, sailing, kayaking and windsurfing or take leisure boat rides on the pristine lake along with fellow guests. There's also a fully equipped fitness centre. The mostly European staff will bend over backward to make sure that you are having a wonderful time.

The Inn at Manitou is open from May until October. Standard, deluxe and luxury accommodations are available, many with a lake or garden view. Packages offered include gourmet breakfast, lunch, dinner and afternoon tea, daily.

The 21st-century lady

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

After a summer of short skirts and proverbially mucking around, the severity of September style hits like a brick: it's time to break out the big trend guns.

This year, however, all flash-in-the-pan trends have been dropped in favour of a pared-down approach to ladylike dressing. But this latest style revolution seems to be less about simply covering up and more about returning to the basics of the 20th-century design, but with a heavily modern twist (think Hepburn, not Hilton, with a cardigan).

Like a melding of last season's power-woman and fashion's ever-so-burning itch to be appropriate, this season's take on ladylike dressing is the 2007 answer to Christian Dior's 1947 "New Look." And in comparison with the gadgets and gizmos aplenty of last season, dressing with the flavour of the past is quite a breath of fresh air indeed!

What we see this season is a complete return to the principles of dressing for a grown woman's body. Forget the tent dresses. Most designers seem to be asking the question: what lines are truly the most flattering? In most cases, the answer lies in the hourglass of Dior's 1947 collection. It's quite ironic that 60 years later we keep returning to the look not because of its retro feel, but for its ability to encompass modernity full throttle.

From Marc Jacob's ode to the 1940s meets 1970s working-woman to Paul Poiret's wide sweeping influence on the likes of "it" designers Proenza Schouler, Thakoon and Rodarte, the runways are chock-full of nostalgic nods to a kind of dressing that once was. But forget lace and most definitely chuck the flowers: designers that have forged into this territory don't rely on those old faithfuls of feminine dress. Shoulders are broad, waist's are nipped, gloves are at elbow's length and pretty little hats are sitting atop the heads of models who stomped out the runway as teenagers but turned back as full-blown women.

For the first time in what feels like forever, the collections were not reaching, were not attempting to be as quirky and ambiguous than the next. Instead, all forms of seasonal experimentation were forgotten, and what we were left with was an overwhelming number of interpretations on dressing like a lady. Take that, futurism!

As any fashionable female might have guessed, it was largely Marc Jacobs who is dealing out this lesson in 21st-century ladylike. Gone are the bejeweled and flowery numbers of his last season's 1920's romp. His lines are crisp; his silhouette is on the straight and narrow. Nearly every outfit is accessorized with a wide-but-not-too-wide brimmed hat. And the fashion prophet continued still at Louis Vuitton. Jacobs' Parisian offerings are equally as powerfully feminine but just slightly softer. Straight knee-length lamé skirts are unexpectedly paired with belted sweaters and floppy berets.

With fresh-faced models trotting down the runway looking as if they'd been plucked from the canvas of a Vermeer, references to the Dutch masters could not be ignored. What's more, the combinations were also the complete mix of sportswear and sophistication that have come to embody the modern female.

With some of the fashion industry's most powerful wizards on board, this latest pendulum swing seems more like a cosmic shift than a fleeting trend.

Bringing it back to that time when hats were a girl's best friend and ladies weren't allowed to leave the house without a set of gloves on, an exhibit featured a selection of gowns from the couture originators: Dior, Givenchy, Balenciaga and Balmain just to name a few. This was a time when the term "mass produced" was just as rarified as a cellphone and every garment was tailor made to its wearer. The exhibit proves once again that with every variation – the "New Look" is as new as ever. As Audrey Hepburn, the patron saint of Ladylike, so famously said in Paris When It Sizzles, "It's just a switch on a switch on a switch."

Looking younger without surgery

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Those whose faces are starting to show the signs of living life but would rather not go under a cosmetic surgeon's knife have the option of refreshing and rejuvenating their skin with medical peels and injections.

The Briarwood Cosmetic Surgical Centre in Oakville, under the direction of owner and renowned plastic surgeon, Stephen C. Brown, offers both surgical and non-surgical procedures.

On Brown's team are Jenny Couto, a registered nurse and cosmetic nurse specialist, and Gerda Oskam, who is a clinical esthetician. Couto specializes in injections, such as Botox, while Oskam administers a number of medical esthetic treatments, including microdermabrasion and chemical peels.

"As we age, sometimes we deflate. We can add volume back into the face," Couto says.

"We lose our definition around the edge of the lips and start to get a lot of little lines, so just by restoring a little bit of that volume and correcting the skin, it gives a more youthful and refreshed appearance. If a job is done well, you can't tell anything has been done. You just look fresh."

All procedures are done at the clinic, and the products used are tissue tailored to what works best in certain areas. The products include fillers such as Collagen, Arecoll, Hyaluronics, Restylane, Hylaform and Juvéderm.

"Juvéderm is distributed by the makers of Botox, Allergan. It lasts longer [than Botox], about nine months to a year, though it varies on the individual and the area that's been treated," Couto says. "It is a smoother monophasic gel – it is a nice product, with less swelling as well.

"Botox is used for dynamic wrinkles typically in the face – frown lines, crow's feet and forehead lines. It also helps to lift eyebrows. It is the number 1 cosmetic procedure that is done in North America. It relaxes the muscles to smooth out wrinkles and to prevent them from getting deeper. It lasts about four months."

The clinic offers a detailed personal consultation, and at that time your needs and desires are discussed and suggestions are made by the staff. Each course of treatment is different, depending on what is being corrected. There is no cookie-cutter approach at the clinic. Budget and expectations are two factors in deciding what work to have done.

The treatments often begin with microdermabrasion, which is a mechanical exfoliation that helps get rid of surface dead skin cells. Microdermabrasion is done before a chemical peel so the peel can penetrate deeper. A chemical peel helps with skin regeneration and stimulation of new skin. In the case of skin that is badly damaged – often by the sun – the clinic offers a series of Photo rejuvenation treatments and sclerotherapy for veins.

Maintenance is important, including home care. Retail products for home use include Vivier, Physician's Choice, Obagi and Skin TX. Oskam can make recommendations.

"We try to give patients natural-looking results so you look fresher. We are the age we are, but you want to look good for your age," Couto says. "Some people come once only for a special occasion like a daughter's wedding, while others continue.

"The first time is always overwhelming, so we try to educate people as to what we can achieve with different treatments. As the relationship goes on, they have a better knowledge base and know what they want. The initial investment is probably the greatest as some treatments last longer than others. Maintenance costs are spread out over time."

BEAUTY SHOP

BY STACEY MICHAELS AND FRANCINE BIRKEN

Dedicated in memory of Carol Wise.

The holidays are over and the kids are getting ready to go back to school. The hot summer days are about to leave us and the prettiest time of year is about to arrive.

Summer's bright eye shadow and stained lips are about to move aside for deeper shades once fall arrives. This season makeup is bold, chic and sexy.

Smoky eyes, blush-coloured lips and shimmering cheekbones radiate, while skin remains flawless with a dust of translucent powder. Shades of green, blue, brown and purple are the hot colour shadows for this fall. Liquid eyeliner makes a great comeback. Make sure to curl your lashes before applying mascara. On the lips, creamy finishes are very trendy. Shades range from earth tones to luscious strawberry and deep mulberry.

Begin serious cleansing regimens as the humidity from the summer months tend to clog pores. A facial is definitely in order – at home or professional. Once the cold temperatures start to arrive and heating systems are turned on, the skin will tend to become drier. Start to apply more richly formulated moisture creams to keep the skin hydrated.

Keep up your diet and exercise routines. Take care of your skin, hair and body, and it will take care of you.

FIORIO: Fall is not just the end of summer, but the beginning of lovely fall. Maurice Fiorio, famed stylist and owner of Fiorio International, says, "The bob in various shapes and forms is back. Short hair can also be sexy." An autumn look can be created by adding some warm colour, texture, layers and dimension.

Clean lines and strong graphic shapes – called minimalist looks – are all the rage. "We're going to see stronger shapes and multi-dimensional haircuts with layers," Fiorio says.

In hair colouring, there is a shift to multi-tone blonde, including the use of vibrant colour but in a subtle fashion. Celebrities Katie Holmes, Rihanna and Victoria Beckham are trend-setting the return of the bob. Rihanna sports a longer bob, while Victoria Beckham has a femme fatale look. The 1970s glam look is also making a return, along with the fringe.

The latest looks are being taught to students of the Fiorio Beauty Academy, where Fiorio visits twice a week to train the students to create the famous Fiorio style.

Fiorio is the creator of the Fiorio cut, which we call the Fiorio Bob. This fantastic new look is proudly worn by Marilyn Denis of the Citytv show CityLine.

But this feather-light formula mends the jagged edges that make hair appear damaged and leaves your locks looking smooth and shiny. Thanks to K-PAK Split End Mender, strands stay strong, top to tips. When it comes to healthy hair, all's well that ends well.

The shadow sets in 10 seconds and won't smudge or crease for up to 12 hours – how wonderful for the brides to be!

For the rich and bold colours, MAC Cosmetics has launched matte eye shadows and eyeliners that have a high percentage of pigment for intense buildable coverage. These shadows are super deep and stay colour-true, and the powders last all day without creasing.

If you are looking for that luminous look, don't look any further. Lise Watier is proud to present Couleur Folle Loose Powder Eyeshadow, used to cover the entire lid and the brow bone in a dramatic or subdued fashion. One of its shades, Folie Kaki (limited edition), echoes the enchanted forest with its tones highlighted by golden glints.

Destiny Cube by Lancôme

Enchanting? Femme Fatale? Jealous? Flirtations? Secretive? It's up to Destiny Cube to decide. Lancôme's decorative and carved precious metal can fit in the palm of your hand. Throw it and one of its 17 faces stamped with a metallic symbol will reveal your future. Inside lies an eye shadow duo on one side and a lipstick with matching gloss on the other.

Eyeliner plays an important part in that smoky eye look. For brides to be, this is for you! Lise Watier introduces Waterproof Eyeliner In Noir Intense, the perfect tool to create a dramatic elongated eye and a real must-have in all makeup pouches. Create eye-opening effects with Rimmel's long-lasting and water-resistant Extreme Definition Duo-Tone Eye Definer. Cargo Smoky-Eye Eyeliner Duo pairs matching cream and powder eyeliners in one easy compact to create the ultimate smoky eye and natural eye-lining when desired. Each formula can be worn alone or the powder can be used to set the cream for longer staying power.

To brighten and lift the eyes, Cargo has created Eye Lighter, a unique and easy-to-use double-ended pen for the eyes with matte highlight shadow on one end and shimmering highlight on the other end. The rounded tip applies matte shadow to the outer corners as well as under the brow and to the lower lash line for instant lift, while the pointed tip applies shimmering shadow to the inner corners of the eyes to open and brighten.

Estée Lauder had brides in mind when it launched Double Wear Zero-Smudge Liquid Eyeliner, a new smudge-proof, waterproof liquid liner that lasts for 15 hours. How amazing! For the finishing touch, Lancôme is proud to introduce Khôl Oriental Duo, a lacquered dark red stick that conceals a black or dark brown kohl pencil twinned with gold. This stick can also be transformed into a hair accessory, to pin a chignon. To complete the eye, Revlon announces 3D Extreme Mascara. The unique Bold Impact Brush is tapered to lift, amplify and separate the tiniest of lashes. Lashes look up to 25 times fuller, 70 per cent curvier, and 80 per cent visibly longer with beautiful separation.

LIPS: If you've ever wanted more luscious lips then Perfect Pouty Lips from Estee Lauder High Gloss Pump is just what you've been waiting for. This newly developed Plumping Complex contains natural ingredients that help stimulate lips to create fuller, more luscious lips. Lips look less lined and more toned.

Let lips shine in four new colour combinations of Cargo's award-wining lip-gloss formula packaged in the signature Cargo tins. You can wear colours alone or mix and match together to achieve whatever look suits you best.

Almost too pretty to paint your lips with, Chanel introduces four Camélias de Chanel, four lip glosses stamped with the image of Coco's favourite flower the camellia. A must to see and try! For the low-lit lip effect, Revlon presents Crushed Velvet Lip Crème. Lips are lavished in bold, velvety colour with a pearlized moist-matte finish. If you are looking for that striking sexy look, Caryl Baker is turning up the heat with the introduction of three, high-impact, red lipsticks: Be-beautiful, Be-dazzled and Be-witched. All three are designed for different skin tones.

Even though the summer is about to leave us, your fingers and toes shouldn't be left in the dark. Make a strong statement with Rimmel's Lycra Wear 10 Nail Polish in daring Black Satin or Hypnotise. This bold statement will complete the Black Orchid Look.

Who Will Live?

"I'm still fasting," Ruthie proudly declared.

"So am I!" replied Benny. "I've been fasting since sundown last night, when Yom Kippur started."

"Yeah, but I'm not even hungry."

"Neither am I."

"Children, children," interrupted Daddy softly. "If you keep it up, you're going to miss the whole Avodah service. And that would be a real shame — after all, you both woke up early just so you could come and watch."

"Yeah. It's a good thing we did. Look how many people are here. If we hadn't gotten here so early, there's no way we would ever get in. So, what's happening right now?"

"Well, what do you see through that large gate over there?"

"That's the altar," answered Benny.

"Good. And who is that standing next to it?"

"Uh...I don't know. It looks like a Kohain, but I don't know who it is."

"That's the Kohain Gadol," explained Daddy.

"Really? I always wanted to see him!" burst out Ruthie. "Wait. That can't be him. The Kohain Gadol always wears colourful clothes, and he's wearing white."

"On Yom Kippur, the Kohain Gadol wears white clothes. White is a sign of purity."

"Oh. What's that in front of him, on the floor?"

"That's a bowl of Ketoret."

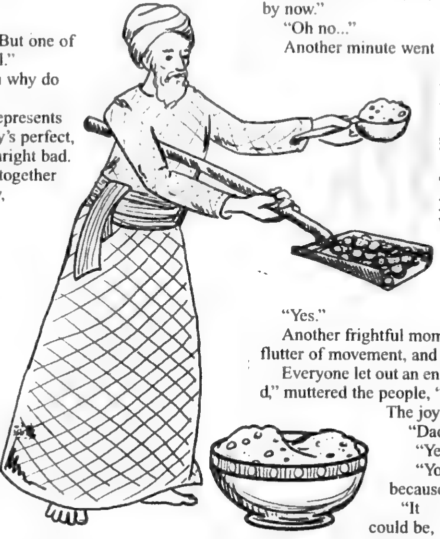
"I know what Ketoret is! That's incense that the Kohain Gadol burns!"

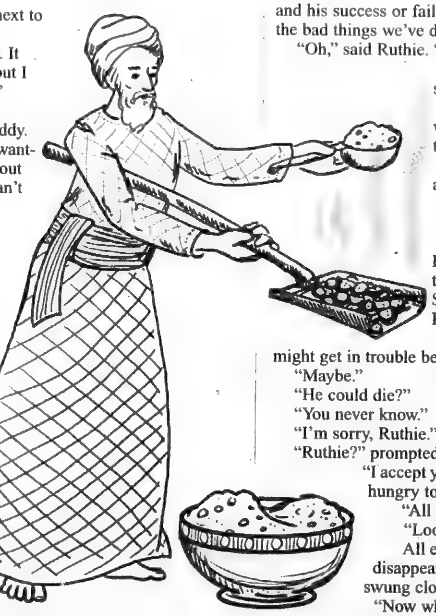
"You're right, Benny. The Ketoret is a mix of eleven spices, finely ground."

"They smell really good, right?"

DIFFERENCES

The Kohain Gadol is dressed for the Yom Kippur Avodah service, as it was performed 2500 years ago in the time of the Temple in Jerusalem. He is going to burn the incense on the red hot coals. Can you find 6 differences between the 2 pictures?





"Well, ten of them do. But one of them actually smells awful."

"Are you serious? Then why do they put in in?"

"Because the Ketoret represents the Jewish people. Nobody's perfect, and some people are downright bad. But still we have to come together as one, and love every Jew, despite their shortcomings."

"Hey, what's the Kohain Gadol doing?" asked Ruthie.

"He's scooping out a handful of Ketoret, to burn in the Inner Sanctum."

"You mean he's going to go in there? That's where they keep the Holy Ark! I thought nobody ever goes in there!"

"On Yom Kippur, the Kohain Gadol does."

"But I thought anyone who goes in there dies!"

"Not if he prepares himself properly. For the last seven days, the Kohain Gadol has been getting ready, purifying his thoughts. Now he is ready to go in."

"And if he doesn't prepare properly, he dies?"

"It's happened before."

"That's scary."

"We have to help him.

"He is representing us with his service, and his success or failure depends on us. We have to regret the bad things we've done, and promise to be better."

"Oh," said Ruthie. "I'm hungry."

"I thought you weren't hungry!" shouted Benny triumphantly.

"Hush!" cautioned an old man, his white eyebrows flashing beneath his turban.

"I wasn't hungry before, but now I am."

"Well, I'm still not hungry! Ha!"

"Daddy, he's bothering me!"

"Benny, I expect more from you. Look, the Kohain Gadol is climbing the steps to go into the Inner Sanctum, and here you are, bothering Ruthie."

"You mean the Kohain Gadol might get in trouble because of me?"

"Maybe."

"He could die?"

"You never know."

"I'm sorry, Ruthie."

"Ruthie?" prompted Daddy.

"I accept your apology. But tell the truth. You're hungry too."

"All right. I'm also hungry."

"Look, the Kohain Gadol is going in!"

All eyes followed the Kohain Gadol as he disappeared into the Inner Sanctum. The door swung closed, and everybody fell silent.

"Now what?" whispered Ruthie.

"We wait," Daddy answered.

"For what?"

"To see if he comes out."

An anxious stillness gripped the assembly. Five minutes passed. Old women muttered prayers. Ten minutes. All eyes were riveted to the door of the Inner sanctum.

"Where is he?" people whispered. "He should be out by now."

"Oh no..."

Another minute went by. And another.

People's faces were turning white. Nobody breathed. A woman fainted.

Benny felt chills going down his spine.

"Ruthie," he whispered. "Remember when I took away your doll and hid it? And you were crying?"

"Yeah."

"I'm sorry."

"It's okay."

"You mean it?"

"Yes."

Another frightful moment passed, and then there was a flutter of movement, and the Kohain Gadol reappeared.

Everyone let out an enormous sign of relief. "Thank G-d," muttered the people, "Thank G-d."

The joy was palpable.

"Daddy," asked Benny.

"Yes?"

"You think the Kohain Gadol lived because I said I was sorry?"

"It could be, Benny. You never know."

L'chaim Retirement Home
A personal message for the New Year
Since the passing of my father in 1990, it was my dream to establish a home for the elderly in which they could feel secure. That dream became a reality when I opened L'chaim, where most of what we do is based on the actual wishes expressed by my father in the years he spent in a retirement home.
I would like to wish you and your family a heartfelt SHANA TOVA, and look forward to the privilege of discussing your needs with you.

TRAVEL TALK

BY BILL GLADSTONE

HAMBURG MUSEUM REMEMBERS ALBERT BALLIN AND HIS "CITY FOR EMIGRANTS"

A new museum in Hamburg, Germany, pays homage to Jewish shipping magnate Albert Ballin and the "Auswandererhallen" (Emigrants Halls), the city for emigrants that he built to accommodate the many thousands of travelers from all over Europe who arrived each week to board ships to America.

The BallinStadt "Port of Dreams" Museum opened in July on the 150th anniversary of Ballin's birth and exactly a century since the port accommodations that he constructed reached their full capacity (in 1907).

From 1850 to 1939, Hamburg served as the "gateway to the world" for some five million European emigrants. Many were fleeing poverty, hunger, and political and religious persecution, with hopes of a better life across the Atlantic. The BallinStadt Museum is dedicated to these people.

A close friend of the kaiser and one of the leading personalities of his day, Ballin (1857-1918) was general director of the Hamburg-American (HAPAG) shipping company, the largest in the world. He is also credited with improving conditions for passengers in the lower decks, and for inventing the cruise-ship industry. He was the first to market ship travel not simply as a necessary means of transport, but as a relaxing and luxurious end in itself.

The departure facilities that Ballin constructed featured sleeping wards with room for up to 5,000 persons daily, dining salons, churches, a synagogue and even a music pavilion and rooms for the required medical examinations. Although Ballin was often excluded from Hamburg society because he was Jewish, his name graces many locations in the modern city. On Ballindamm Street, house number 25, is the Ballin Haus, the present-day headquarters of the Hapag-Lloyd company.

For further information on the BallinStadt Museum, visit the website www.ballinstadt.com.

Tel Aviv Photography Exhibits: Continuing at the Tel Aviv Museum of Art are two photography exhibitions. "Perfect Intimacy," until Oct. 13, highlights the works of Lili Almog who closely record the lives of Carmelite nuns through portraits and interiors of prayer rooms and living quarters in Haifa, Bethlehem, and Port Tobacco, Maryland. "These photographs present a fascinating view into an intense devotional practice rarely seen by the outside."

The other exhibit – "Vardi Kahana: One Family" – consists of a series of 59 diverse photographs that Kahana took of members of her extended family over three generations. Images include three sisters bearing consecutive tattooed numbers from Auschwitz, kibbutzniks from the Shomer Hatza'ir movement in the north, haredi homes in Jerusalem, and secular homes in Savion and Tel Aviv. Kahana's photographs "explore the varied political, social, geographical, and ideological aspects of Israeli life." Until Oct. 6.

The museum is located at 27 Shaul Hamelech Blvd., Tel Aviv. Its website address is www.tamuseum.com.

Heliodorus Stele: The Israel Museum recently unveiled a 2,200-year-old stele (inscribed stone block) that provides new insight into the story of Heliodorus and the Temple in Jerusalem, as related in the Second Book of Maccabees.

"The Heliodorus stele is one of the most important and revealing Hellenistic inscriptions from Israel," said museum director James Snyder. "It contextualizes the Second Book of Maccabees and provides an independent and authentic source for an important episode in the history leading up to the Maccabean Revolt, whose victorious conclusion is celebrated each year during the Jewish festival of Chanukah."

This presentation marks the first public display of the stele, which is on extended loan from Michael and Judy Steinhardt of New York.

Sculpture in San Francisco: A retrospective exhibition of the monumental wooden sculptures and drawings of Louise Nevelson (1899-1988), who is described as "one of the towering figures of postwar American art," are on view at the de Young Museum, San Francisco, from Oct. 27 to Jan. 13, 2008. Organized by the Jewish Museum of New York, the exhibition highlights Nevelson's autobiographical works, which symbolically address issues of marriage, motherhood, death, Jewish culture, memory and feminism.

Heartfelt portrait of a political activist

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"There is nothing like standing in the giddy centre of history," exults Ariel Dorfman, the novelist, playwright, essayist, political and human rights activist and academic.

These are not the idle words of an indolent dilettante.

Born in Argentina, raised in the United States and formed in Chile, he played a role in one of Latin America's most promising yet tragic encounters with social and political change.

As the cultural adviser to Chile's doomed socialist president, Salvador Allende, whom he likens to Moses leading his people to the Promised Land, Dorfman was a player in what could have been a historically significant revolution had it not been nipped in the bud.

But as fate would have it, Allende's democratically elected government, which swept to power in 1970, was overthrown in a violent, U.S.-backed military coup on Sept. 11, 1973. Allende's successor, Gen. Augusto Pinochet, who was forced to step down in 1990, oppressed and murdered his opponents.

Miraculously, Dorfman survived the bloodbath during which Allende was killed, hidden by a succession of sympathizers and protected for two months by the Argentine embassy in Santiago.

Forced into exile, he found a haven in Paris, Amsterdam and Washington, D.C. before returning to Chile at the tail end of Pinochet's dictatorship. Since then, he has divided his time between Chile and the United States, where he is a professor of literature and Latin American studies at Duke University.

A trenchant critic of North American cultural domination and the author of works such as How to Read Donald Duck and Death and the Maiden, Dorfman is the subject of Peter Raymont's heartfelt, beautifully crafted documentary, A Promise to the Dead: The Exile Journey of Ariel Dorfman.

The 92-minute movie, which will be screened at this year's Toronto International Film Festival starting on Sept. 6, is based on his memoir, Heading South, Looking North.

The title of Raymont's cinematic tribute is taken from a wistful observation by Dorfman, an idealistic, compassionate and somewhat flamboyant figure. As he wonders why he was spared during the chaotic upheavals of the coup, he muses, "There has to have been inside me the whisper of a promise. It was a promise to the dead. A promise that I would live and tell the story."

And that is precisely what he has done, not only in his essays and novels, but in this hard-hitting and occasionally poignant film, which explores themes such as exile, memory and democracy through the prism of Dorfman's tumultuous life.

A Promise to the Dead opens as he stands on front of La Moneda, the presidential palace in Santiago bombed by Pinochet's supporters in September 1973. The palace reminds him of death but also of better times, when Chile seemed poised on the cusp of becoming a republic dedicated to social justice in a continent rife with injustice, violence and poverty, and when he felt "incredibly alive."

Shot in Chile, Argentina and the United States, it unfolds against the backdrop of archival footage and photographs, and moves effortlessly from one scene to another.

He meets former friends and protectors as well as relatives of Chileans who disappeared during the Pinochet interregnum. He visits a facility where anti-Pinochet dissidents were tortured and a street corner in Santiago where he might easily have been mowed down. He returns to the Argentine embassy. And, in the company of his obviously sensitive son, he makes a painful trip to the cemetery where his grandmother was buried and then disinterred without the knowledge of her family.

The theme of exile is omnipresent, not only as it pertains to Dorfman's own experiences but in reference to his family's history. His grandfather, a Russian Jew, fled the pogroms of Odessa and immigrated to Argentina. His grandmother, a cultured and educated person, was none other than Leon Trotsky's interpreter.

Dorfman's father, a left-wing academic, escaped after the 1943 military coup in Argentina. Dorfman, then a year old, was brought up in New York City. Seduced by U.S. media culture, he was an all-American boy. His father, however, was at odds with the United States' foreign policy. Amid the McCarthyist purge, the Dorfmans fled to Chile, where they acquired citizenship.

Although Dorfman feels at home in both Chile and the United States, he admits that he has "divided loyalties and allegiances." In the unpejorative sense of the word, he is truly a "rootless cosmopolitan," a phrase Joseph Stalin coined in the late 1940s and early 1950s to demonize Soviet Jews.

As demonstrated in the film, Dorfman is a cool-headed analyst and a conciliator. In a startling admission, following a staunch denial that Chile was on the road to becoming a second Cuba, he acknowledges that the Allende government frightened allies and adversaries alike. And in an impassioned cri de coeur, he urges Chileans to respect their profound political differences and coexist for the sake of the country.

Dorfman is a complex and emotional individual whose passions run deep, and in A Promise to the Dead, they are articulated with sincerity and verve.

Eye on Arts

JIHAD: THE MUSICAL, A SATIRE OF AL QAEDA, DEBUTS IN EDINBURGH

Is Islamic terrorism a laughable matter? Hardly so, but neither was Hitler and the Third Reich – both of which were repeatedly mocked in popular song and culture during even the darkest days of World War II.

A new musical entertainment called Jihad: The Musical debuted last month at Scotland's Edinburgh Fringe Festival. Billed as a "madcap gallop through the wacky world of international terrorism," it features wisecracking terrorists brandishing cardboard AK-47s and a high-kicking chorus line of dancers cloaked from head to foot in shimmering pink burkas. The 12 original songs include I Wanna Be Like Osama, a video clip of which has been viewed more than 125,000 times on YouTube.

Even before it opened, the musical was criticized for being a "tasteless portrayal of terrorism and its victims," but producer James Lawler said it was conceived to encourage the public to learn to laugh instead of being afraid of Islamist terror. "It was developed in the same blitz spirit that characterized comedy during World War II," he told Time magazine, one of numerous mainstream publications to report on the production.

Co-writers Zoe Samuel and Benjamin Sheuer say they took great care to avoid insulting moderate Muslims. "We're not satirizing innocents," Samuel said. "We're satirizing terrorists, neocons and apologists – people who exploit other people's beliefs to shore up their own power."

Early reviewers, according to Time magazine, "have applauded the show for employing humour without losing sight of the underlying tragedy." Still, Jihad: The Musical sounds like the sort of production that one might call a "bomb."

Names in the News: Tourism authorities in Safed, in Israel's Galilee, are hoping a Rosh Hashanah visit by pop singer Madonna will help boost a local tourist industry that has been in a slump since last year's war with Hezbollah.

As reported by the JTA news agency, Madonna plans to visit Safed, Jerusalem, the Golan Heights and other areas as part of a tour organized by the Los Angeles-based Kabbalah Centre. It is her first visit to Israel in three years.

The pop icon, an outspoken popularizer of Kabbalah, is expected to bring along celebrity friends Demi Moore and Donna Karan, as well as about 3,000 Kabbalah Centre students for a 10-day pilgrimage to Israel that is set to end on Yom Kippur.

Rachel Corrie* Resurrected: Toronto-based Theatre Panik, which "is committed to doing theatre that gives voice to those who would otherwise go unheard," has announced plans to present the controversial play My Name Is Rachel Corrie at the Tarragon Extra Space in 2008.

Earlier this year, the play appeared on CanStage's list of upcoming productions but was soon canned. Artistic producer Martin Bragg's explanation was that the show was flat onstage but, as the Toronto Star delicately put it last week, "rumours surfaced that CanStage worried it would have upset prominent donors."

At the centre of this tale is a tragedy as ugly and heartbreaking as a traffic accident. Corrie, a young American activist with the pro-Palestinian International Solidarity Movement, purposely sat in the path of an oncoming Israeli bulldozer as it was demolishing a building; the driver didn't see her and she was crushed to death. Hence her subsequent martyrdom on stage.

Not unexpectedly, the play, a one-woman show based on Corrie's writings, received much media attention when London's Royal Court Theatre first presented it several years back. It has since been revived in the West End, Edinburgh, New York and Seattle.

The play is "not an animated recruiting poster for Palestinian activists," according to the New York Times. "Its deeper fascination lies in its invigoratingly detailed portrait of a passionate political idealist in search of a constructive outlet."

Theatre Panik has previously waded into Middle Eastern politics with Territories, which won a Summerworks prize for best production of a new play in 2005. The company is the recipient of several grants from the Ontario Arts Council, including one for $8,500 in 2006. Its artistic co-directors are Niki Landau and Paul Lampert.

Arts in Brief

- Disengagement, a new film by Israeli director Amos Gitai (Free Zone, Kaddosh, Kippur) is playing at the Toronto International Film Festival, which opens this week. Gitai and actor Juliette Binoche are both supposed to be in town for this, the film's North American première.
- Toronto Yiddish writer-poet Simcha Simchovitch recently travelled to his hometown of Otwock, Poland, as the guest of the Otwock Memorial Committee, to participate in the town's 65th anniversary memorial. Simchovitch is the author of Stepchild on the Vistula, which tells of his childhood and youth in Otwock. He spent 10 days there, his first trip back since 1948.
- World Literacy of Canada celebrates International Literacy Day 2007, as declared by UNESCO, to remind the international community of the status of literacy and adult learning globally. Reception, 401 Richmond St., Suite 236. Friday, Sept. 7, 2 to 5 p.m. 416-977-0008

Doc more satisfying than salt

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Viewers of Ryan Feldman's documentary Lick Salt: A Grandson's Tale will agree it's full of flavour.

The film explores Feldman's relationship with his previously estranged grandmother, Cecile. The two meet at Cecile's husband's funeral, and the film tracks their re-acquaintance over the following three years.

During this time, viewers gain a poignant look into the life of a lonely old woman. The cause of the estrangement between Cecile and her son (Feldman's father) surfaces, and, as Cecile loses touch more and more with reality, she is connected back to her childhood memories of fleeing the Nazis.

Feldman says filming Cecile was an "instinctual" choice. He didn't immediately know there would be a story, he says, but by the end he learned many lessons from his grandmother.

"[I learned] what it means to listen and what it means to be heard, and how powerful a mechanism for change that can be," says Feldman, 33.

"Change comes from acceptance. In the story of the film when she starts to be heard, she can accept certain things."

Feldman refers to Cecile's gradual acceptance of in-home care, and becoming comfortable with her son holding power of attorney.

Cecile is never dull to watch, as her character is intricate and multi-layered. She is, at different points, cutting and demanding, frail, completely out of touch with reality, lonely, charismatic, creative and always honest.

("What do I have to lie about?" she asks, surprised and almost affronted, when her grandson says he likes that latter quality.)

Feldman says that, due to his grandmother's growing distance from reality during filming, he was acutely aware of his duty to represent her properly.

"I always said in the back of my mind that no matter how much vulnerability I showed, it was okay, as long as at the end of the film, everybody involved still had their dignity. And I felt that she did. Especially because people are able to laugh," he says.

A captivating scene that explores this concept depicts Cecile trying to get a 1944 photograph of her cousin Aubrey to eat some food. She is frustrated that the photo will not answer her or eat anything, and her grandson keeps repeating that a picture can't eat.

"I don't think that I have 'one over' on her," he says of the scene. "I feel that I'm doing her a service because people are enjoying her and enjoying us and that Abbot and Costello routine."

While Cecile and Ryan's relationship is intriguing to follow, the cinematography can sometimes lose a viewer's interest, with lengthy shots of objects, silent-movie-esque captions, and conversations in a restaurant where the background sound overpowers the dialogue.

Feldman describes Cecile as "mishuga."

"She's a wild, very creative, strong woman who never had an opportunity to enjoy her creativity to any potential," he says.

Feldman blames her childhood experiences for the stifling, as well as her late husband, who Feldman says was always telling her to be quiet, and stop talking so much.

"She was just a little girl running naked in the snow from Germans," he says, recalling an anecdote Cecile tells in the film.

Prior to the funeral, Feldman and Cecile had not spoken in 15 years. He remembers feeling linked to Cecile in childhood, however, as he was also always asking too many questions.

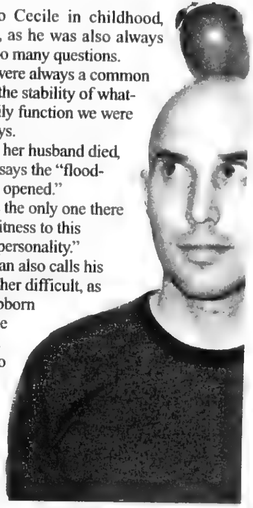
"We were always a common threat to the stability of whatever family function we were at," he says.

When her husband died, Feldman says the "floodgates had opened."

"I was the only one there to bear witness to this amazing personality."

Feldman also calls his grandmother difficult, as she is stubborn and people often find her hard to get along with.

"We found a harmony together, she was no threat to me," he says.



Filmmaker Ryan Feldman

"People think that another person can do damage to them, but really, you take that top layer away and we're all really kind of harmless. If we really want to take offence the choice is there."

Lick Salt premiered in France at the Cinema Du Reel festival, screened in Toronto at the Brunswick Theatre on August 29, and will screen in Japan at the Yamagata Doc Film Festival in October.

Feldman currently has a development deal with CTV for another personal documentary and has plans to start working on dramatic films as well. For more information visit www.ryfeproductions.com.

Musician's Jewish roots show when she plays blues

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Blues musician Lily Sazz is amazed at the number of other Jewish blues musicians that she's met.

The keyboard player for Groove Corporation, Hen Party and the annual Women's Blues Revue, at Toronto's Massey Hall, figures it's because Jewish musicians relate to the suffering associated with the genre.

Lily Sazz

"For me, it was accidental, I fell into the blues," Sazz says.

"I've been told by another Jewish musician that my Jewishness is showing because I'm using minor chords and almost Hebrew folk melodies are coming out in the songs I'm writing. So, somewhere it's in the fabric of my being and I didn't even know it."

Sazz, 46, comes from what she has been told was the town with the smallest Jewish community in Canada – Beamsville, Ont.

"We had a very small synagogue called Baron Hirsh. My father was one of the pioneers that started it," she says.

"It was in a very old one-room school house that had been converted. There is no synagogue there anymore. People either died or moved away. It was only open on High Holidays. There weren't enough members to form a minyan on a weekly basis."

She currently lives in Dundas, Ont., with her husband, Paul Fayter, a professor at York University

A classically trained musician, Sazz studied piano and harpsichord at McMaster University. Early in her university days, she saw Crowbar, a rock band with blues roots, in Hamilton, Ont.

"I saw Kelly Jay playing the piano and had never seen anything like that," she says. "The next night, we went to catch them at a club. Friends who knew the band introduced me. The next thing I knew I was sitting next to Kelly Jay on the stage being humiliated and watching him do his thing. He suggested I sell my harpsichord, get a keyboard and join a rock band.

"Anyway, one thing led to another and I started taking guitar lessons from Crowbar's guitarist Alex MacDougall. Through the band I got to know other people, and next thing I knew, I had a job in the first band I was ever in, which was terrible. It gave me a chance to learn.

"I started playing by ear, which is something I've never done, because of course, when you're classically trained, you just read the dots on the page and interpret them as emotionally as you can. There's no improvisation or anything," she says.

Sazz played pop-rock and happily began to make a living at it – gigging her way through the last two years of university. Once she felt confident, she began to play blues and worked on her solos. Then she ended up playing in a band with MacDougall and was thrilled she played at a level that was acceptable to her teacher and mentor. Around that time, she gave up guitar and flute to focus on keyboards and vocalizing – mainly as a backup singer.

Currently, she's writing songs for Hen Party, an acoustic group made up of three women, and Groove Corporation, an eight- to 10-piece funk/rhythm and blues band.

Sazz was the musical director of Women's Blues Revue, a Toronto Blues Society production, for 10 years, and she has played in the revue's band for 11. Although she retired from her position as musical director this year, she will continue in her role as the revue's keyboard player this year at the concert on Dec. 1.

She can also be heard playing on a compilation CD of live recordings of performances from the Women's Blues Revue, Women's Blues Revue Live.

Sazz's says her most memorable moment onstage was playing with fellow Jewish keyboard player Paul Shaffer at Toronto's Mod Club in June 2006, at a fundraiser for MusiCan, whose mission is to ensure that young Canadians have access to music programs through their school systems.

"Paul Shaffer is always someone I revered, and I related to the fact he's not a lead singer, that he's a keyboard player and bandleader like me," she says.

"Alex called me 'the Paul Shaffer of the Women's Blues Revue' because that is the role I played. For that night, I used the Women's Blues Revue Band and called them, the Queen Bees. We backed Molly Johnson, Haydain Neale from [the band] jacksoul, Gerald Eaton from the Philosopher Kings, Roy Kenner, Serena Ryder and Robbie Lane, but the crown jewel was playing with Paul. It was amazing!"

The Looming Tower examines events that culminated in 9/11

The Looming Tower: Al Qaeda and the Road to 9/11* by Lawrence Wright, published by Alfred A. Knopf.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The events that culminated in 9/11, the catastrophic Al Qaeda terrorist attacks on the United States on Sept. 11, 2001, turn on a few pivotal figures.

Sayyid Qutb, the Egyptian founder of the modern Islamic movement, and Osama bin Laden, the Saudi spiritual father of Al Qaeda, were among the aggrieved Muslim radicals who made it possible philosophically and operationally.

Lawrence Wright's masterful book, The Looming Tower: Al Qaeda and the Road to 9/11, focuses on this band of Muslim brothers.

Wright's volume is also an exposé of blindness at the highest levels of the American government.

When FBI agent Daniel Coleman told his superiors in 1996 that bin Laden – a financier of terrorism – posed a strategic threat to the United States, no one took him seriously.

And when President George W. Bush's national security adviser, Condoleezza Rice, was briefed on the subject a few months after his inaugural, she left the impression that she had never heard of bin Laden.

To be fair, Wright adds, Richard Clarke, the national coordinator for counterterrorism in the Bush administration, was on the ball. Two months before Sept. 11, he issued a prescient warning: "Something really spectacular is going to happen, and it's going to happen soon."

Clarke and a handful of U.S. officials, such as John O'Neill, the FBI's chief of counterterrorism, were familiar with bin Laden who, in August 1996, declared war on America from a cave in Afghanistan.

The World Trade Center, the target of Al Qaeda's attack on Sept. 11, 2001

The son of an extremely wealthy building contractor born in Yemen, bin Laden was highly influenced by Abdullah Azzam, a Palestinian scholar and mystic born in the West Bank town of Jenin. Animated by a vision that Islam would achieve world domination by force of arms, Azzam combined piety and learning with utter intransigence. His slogan was "Jihad and the rifle alone. No negotiations, no conferences, no dialogue."

Azzam railed against jahiliyya, the world of unbelief, which existed before Islam and was undermining the faithful with the lures of materialism, secularism and sexual equality.

Picking up where Azzam left off, bin Laden argued that the United States would not cease supporting Israel until "we give them a lot of blows." Tracing his animus against America back to 1982, Wright says that his hatred was a function of his belief that the United States permitted Israel to invade Lebanon.

Yet, as Wright points out, bin Laden kept such beliefs to himself, informing members of Saudi Arabia's royal family that he was grateful for American aid to Muslim fighters battling the Soviet army in Afghanistan.

Wright also focuses on Ayman al-Zawahiri, bin Laden's right-hand man. Initiated into the Egyptian Muslim fundamentalist movement at only the age of 15, and the scion of well-to-do parents, Zawahiri was further radicalized by Israel's victory in the Six Day War.

As Wright puts it, "The profound appeal of Islamic fundamentalism in Egypt and elsewhere was born in this shocking debacle."

To Zawhiri and like-minded Muslims, Islam was the answer to Egypt's ills. In practice, this meant that Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser's secular nationalist regime had to be toppled so that Islamic law could be imposed on Egypt.

Casting his eyes further afield, Zawahiri cited three grievances against the United States: the presence of U.S. troops in Saudi Arabia after the 1991 Gulf War; Washington's crusade against Iraq prior to its 2003 invasion; and its support of Israel.

Zawahiri and bin Laden were both inspired by Qutb, a writer and a supervisor employed by the ministry of education in Egypt. Like many Arabs, he felt betrayed by the sympathy shown to the Zionist cause by the United States during the first Arab-Israeli war in 1948.

Drawing on these sentiments, he developed the thesis that only Islam, with its laws, social codes and economic rules, offered a way out of the morass in which Arabs found themselves.

In his view, Islam and modernity were incompatible. A visit to the United States in the late 1940s reinforced this belief.

Wright says that Zawahiri and bin Laden, though not friends, constituted an awesome force.

"Each man filled a need in the other," he observes. "Zawahiri wanted money and contacts, which bin Laden had in abundance. Bin Laden, an idealist given to causes, sought direction. Zawahiri, a seasoned propagandist, supplied it."

Global jihad was their objective. Wright cites Al Qaeda's bombing of the Egyptian embassy in Islamabad, Pakistan, in November 1995 as the prototype of future Al Qaeda attacks.

The pair were initially flummoxed by the prohibition against suicide in Islam. But this problem was conveniently resolved when Zawahiri decreed that anyone who gave his life in pursuit of Islam, the true faith, was to be regarded as a heroic martyr who would be amply rewarded in paradise.

According to Wright, the bombing of the U.S. embassy in Beirut in 1983 left a profound impression on bin Laden, convincing him that suicide bombers could be astonishingly effective.

In line with bin Laden's class origins and his training as an engineer, the vast majority of Al Qaeda recruits hailed from the middle or upper classes. Largely college educated, with a strong bias in the natural sciences and engineering, they were well-adjusted young men who came predominantly from Saudi Arabia and Egypt. Citing an example, he mentions Mohamed Atta, the Egyptian ringleader of the 9/11 hijackers.

Wright says that the Saudi government, in the aftermath of the 1979 attack on the Grand Mosque in Mecca, attempted to co-opt Muslim extremists by building hundreds of mosques and religious schools. But the plan backfired when bin Laden turned on the Saudi government, branding it as corrupt and pro-American.

Wright's chapter on bin Laden and the Taliban regime in Afghanistan is instructive.

Mullah Omar, the Taliban leader, originally had no quarrel with the United States. But assuming that bin Laden could help rebuild Afghanistan after the Soviet retreat, he formed what would be a disastrous alliance with him.

Wright, a staff writer for the New Yorker, spent five years researching and writing The Looming Tower. His time was well spent. This is a must-read work, having won this year's National Book Award for non-fiction.

Food writer and critic Sara Waxman turns a new page

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

"Sara Waxman tastes and tells."

With these choice words, one of Toronto's most seasoned restaurant critics and food writers recently announced her intention to publish a new magazine dedicated to gustatory delights in the Greater Toronto Area.

Dine, as her glossy prospectus promises, will help gourmets achieve what she describes as "dish-fulfilment."

Scheduled to be launched in November, Dine will carry restaurant reviews and articles of interest to foodies and wine connoisseurs.

"It will not be a restaurant listing," said Waxman, whose reviews and stories have appeared in the Toronto Sun, the National Post, the Toronto Star, TV Guide and En Route, among other publications.

The 120- to 150-page magazine, of which she is publisher and editor-in-chief, will be cutting-edge in content and contain dazzling photography. "I feel it will be the Vogue magazine of dining."

With a print run of about 11,000 copies, Dine will appear once a year and will be augmented by a constantly updated website (www.dinemagazine.ca).

It may yet appear more frequently. "Some people are pushing me to put it out two to four times a year. We'll see."

To Waxman, Dine will fill a niche, though she realizes that there are competitors in the field, including Dining Out and Toronto Life.

"We'll showcase the dining scene in Toronto, which is pretty hot," she said in an interview at her elegant condominium home in the Yorkville neighbourhood.

"In terms of quality, our top restaurants and second-tier restaurants compare with those in New York City. I wouldn't be embarrassed to recommend any of our good restaurants."

Waxman expects Dine to be successful. "I really believe in it."

An accomplished cook who has had a romance with food since childhood, Waxman said that Dine will be distributed by various means.

Some copies will be sold at newsstands and others will be carried by the Globe and Mail as a supplement. Still others will be stocked by the Whole Food grocery store chain, as well as The Cookbook Store and other retail outlets.

Guests who check into such five-star hotels as the Four Seasons and the new Hazelton Park Hyatt will also have access to Dine.

"It'll be kept as an amenity in the room, like hand lotion and slippers," she said.

Waxman, the author of four cookbooks ranging from The Great Hadassah Cookbook to Toronto's Cheaper Eats, started thinking about producing a magazine like Dine since last winter.

"It just kind of evolved into a good idea," she observed. "Dining out in restaurants has become the entertainment of the world. You may not be able to go on a Mediterranean cruise, but you can go out to dinner."

Her partners in the venture are Peter Roston, a chartered accountant, and Jay Madarino, the president of C.J. Graphics.

"There are no shortage of investors," she said. "This is a good product, and I have a reputation of integrity and good work."

Sara Waxman

The widow of the Canadian actor Al Waxman (star of The King of Kensington and Cagney & Lacey), she plans to write much of the copy. "Who knows the dining scene better than I? I've been writing about food for over 25 years, and mine is an educated opinion."

Writers aside from Waxman will contribute to Dine as well. "Everyone associated with this publication is a pro."

For example, two of the contributors in the first edition will be the restaurateur Franco Prevedello, who founded Centro and Splendido, and the vintner Donald Ziraldo, who co-founded the Inniskillin winery. Prevedello will produce a column on restaurant trends, while Ziraldo will write a commentary on wine.

She does not rule out the possibility that Dine will carry items of Jewish interest. After all, Waxman was practically weaned on Jewish soul food. "My mother was a great cook. She made wonderful brisket and soups."

Waxman, born in Bialystok, Poland, arrived in Canada in July 1939, less than two months before the outbreak of World War II.

She was barely a year old when she immigrated to Canada with her parents, Mendel and Ann Shapiro, and her older sister, Essie. They were on the last ship to leave the Polish port of Gdynia prior to Germany's invasion of Poland.

The family was permitted into Canada after Mendel, a businessman, convinced the Canadian government that he was a farmer.

He wanted to emigrate from Poland because he sensed that serious trouble was brewing in Europe.

In retrospect, he was extremely prescient. All the members of his family, with the exception of his oldest sister and her children, were murdered during the Holocaust. Ann's entire family was also wiped out.

For the first five years in Canada, the Shapiros struggled to run a farm in Manitoba. They then moved to Winnipeg, where Mendel ran hotels and bought the KIK soft drink bottling company.

"I loved food from an early age," said Waxman. "Planting it, shopping for it and cooking it."

Before her marriage – which lasted for 32 years until her husband's untimely death in 2001 during heart surgery – Waxman worked as an editorial assistant at Saturday Night magazine under editor Robert Fulford.

After giving birth to two children, Tobaron and Adam, now an artist and an actor, respectively, she became a court reporter. "I took shorthand at 220 words a minute."

When a publisher asked her husband, Al, if he would like to write a book, he suggested that his wife, Sara, should write one. She proceeded to write The King's Wife's Cookbook, which led to a daily column, Supper in a Hurry, in the Toronto Star from 1981 to 1982. That, in turn, paved the way for her stint as a weekly columnist at the Toronto Sun, and, later, the National Post.

She gave up her columns in 2005, tired of the grind.

"I had enough and wanted something more," explained Waxman, who still operates Waxworx, a company specializing in the recruitment of food industry personnel. "I wasn't getting personal satisfaction anymore, and I was getting tired of eating out."

Yet, as her involvement in Dine strongly suggests, Waxman remains passionate about food.

"Al and I both had a lot of friends, and we liked to entertain. We would have seders for 20-odd people. Al was a gourmet, but when I married him, he was happy with a cold hot dog." Under her tutelage, he turned into a discerning and picky diner.

And with Dine, she hopes to educate many more.

Israel & the Jewish World

Israel could suffer because of Armenian debate

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

NEW YORK — The Anti-Defamation League's reversal last month of its position on the Armenian genocide has set off a flurry of diplomatic activity in Turkey and Israel.

Officials in Ankara and Jerusalem, in co-ordination with American Jewish leaders, were working last week to contain the fallout from the ADL's statement, which recognized the World War I massacres of Armenians by Ottoman Turks as "tantamount to genocide."

Malcolm Hoenlein

The ADL was forced to reverse its longstanding position – shared by other major American Jewish organizations – of neutrality on the genocide question amid growing dissension within its own ranks.

Jewish leaders warned that recognizing the genocide, as the U.S. Congress is now considering, could undermine American strategic interests in the Middle East and Turkey's robust military and economic partnership with Israel. Also deemed at risk was the security of Turkish Jewry, which sent a letter earlier this year opposing a congressional resolution on the matter.

Nabi Sensoy, Turkey's ambassador in Washington, told JTA that his government was strongly opposed to any congressional action, but that the Turkish Jewish community had nothing to fear in any case. Sensoy was less sure that Turkey's relations with Israel and the United States would survive a resolution unscathed.

"I cannot really dismiss that if this resolution does pass that there will be certain impacts on certain relationships," Sensoy said. "There is no doubt about it."

Of those raising the spectre of reprisals against Turkish Jewry, Sensoy said, "I'm very disturbed to hear this kind of remark coming from anywhere. They seem to be forgetting the history of Turks and Jews, which goes back at least 500 years. We've always had the best of relations between Turks and Jews, and the Turkish Jewish community is part and parcel, and an integral part, of the Turkish community."

What began more than a month ago as a small local protest against an ADL-sponsored program in the Boston suburbs has escalated into an international crisis with a nation deemed central to American interests and Israeli security.

Turkey is Israel's closest – and arguably its only – regional ally and is central to American policy in the Middle East.

Mindful of Turkey's importance, the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations began a series of discussions on the matter last week. Malcolm Hoenlein, the group's executive vice-chairman, told JTA that the conference had not yet decided how or whether to respond.

"As wiser heads have prevailed, people are looking for us to play a role in trying to control and calm down the situation so there are no ramifications and repercussions that have nothing to do with the substance" of the issue, Hoenlein said.

Though Jewish groups have toed a careful line on the genocide question for years, the issue exploded this summer after the town council of Watertown, Mass., home to one of the country's largest Armenian communities, voted to sever ties with an ADL anti-bigotry program in protest of the organization's refusal to acknowledge the genocide.

After the vote, the ADL's regional director in Boston, Andrew Tarsy, switched gears and condemned his organization's position. Tarsy was promptly fired by Foxman.

The Boston ADL leadership rebelled and with pressure mounting, Foxman reversed himself, acknowledging that the "consequences" of Ottoman massacres of Armenians were "tantamount to genocide." Tarsy was reinstated as Boston director on Aug. 27.

An outraged Turkey communicated its dismay to Israeli and Jewish leaders, with some Turkish officials suggesting that Israel had to "deliver" American Jewish groups on this issue.

Namik Tan, Turkey's ambassador, reportedly said that his country believed its strategic relationship with Israel also involved the whole Jewish world.

The Turkish people "cannot make that differentiation" between Israel and American Jewish organizations, Nan told the Jerusalem Post.

"On some issues there is no such thing as 'Israel cannot deliver,'" he continued, adding that this was one of those issues.

According to an unofficial translation, the Turkish Foreign Ministry issued a statement saying use of the genocide label is "historically and legally baseless" and accusing the ADL of trying to "rewrite the history" of the period.

"We consider the statement of the ADL as an injustice to the unique character of the Holocaust, as well as to the memories of its victims," the statement said. "We expect it to be rectified."

Abe Foxman

On Aug. 26, the ADL released a second statement reiterating its support for a joint Turkish-Armenian commission to investigate the matter – a move Turkey supports – and its opposition to a resolution in Congress. Foxman also wrote to Turkey's prime minister, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, "to express regret for any pain we have caused to you and the Turkish people in these past few days."

In Turkey, those steps were seen as backtracking. Erdogan said the ADL had rectified its "mistake," according to the Turkish Daily News. Sensoy said he felt the ADL had reversed itself again and that its current position reflected a more "balanced situation."

"We are expecting the American Jewish organizations to be neutral about this," Sensoy said. "Although we're aware of the fact that this is a very sensitive issue for the Israeli people and the Jewish community, what we have to seek is the truth."

London editor: I'd celebrate Israel's nuking

JTA

LONDON — The editor of an Arabic daily newspaper in London said he would "dance with delight" if Iranian missiles hit Israel.

"If the Iranian missiles strike Israel, by Allah, I will go to Trafalgar Square and dance with delight," Abd Al-Bari Atwan said in an interview with the Lebanese television station ANB in June, according to the Jerusalem Post.

Bari Atwan is editor of Al-Quds Al-Arabi, a pan-Arab daily he founded in 1989. He is also a commentator on Sky News and BBC News 24.

Brewers' slugger dished up double dose of mystery

By MARTIN ABRAMOWITZ
JTA

NEWTON, Mass. — As the baseball season heads into the home stretch and the High Holy Days approach, Ryan Braun is supplying a double dose of suspense: Will the Milwaukee Brewers' slugging third baseman become the first Jewish player to be named Rookie of the Year in either league? And does he plan to take a day off on Yom Kippur in the tradition of Hank Greenberg, Sandy Koufax and Shawn Green?

Braun, 25, has made an impact since his debut at the end of May. The California native made history in July by becoming the first player to be named the National League's Rookie of the Month and Player of the Month.

After 83 games he was batting .333 with 25 home runs and 66 runs batted in.

If Braun, the son of an Israeli who immigrated to the United States at the age of 7, is selected by the Baseball Writers' Association of America as the National League's top rookie, it would mark a first for Jewish players in Major League Baseball history.

Jewish Hall of Famers Hank Greenberg and Lou Boudreau played before the award was instituted in 1947. Koufax wasn't even close in 1955. Nor were the nine current Jewish major leaguers: Shawn Green, Brad Ausmus, Mike Lieberthal, Jason Marquis, Kevin Youkilis, Scott Schoeneweis and John Grabow, along with promising second-year players Ian Kinsler and Jason Hirsh.

The closest any Jewish player came to winning Rookie of the Year was another slugging third baseman, Al Rosen of the Cleveland Indians. In 1950 he led the American League with 37 home runs, but lost out in the balloting to Red Sox first baseman Walt Dropo, who batted .322 and was the RBI leader with 144.

Rosen went on to become the American League MVP in 1953, while Dropo never came close to matching his rookie totals.

Over the years, as the baseball season has wound down toward the playoffs, observers of Jews in baseball traditionally wonder what the prominent Jewish players will do on Yom Kippur, play or pray.

In earlier decades, Greenberg and Koufax made the American Jewish community proud with their decisions to sit out on the holy day – Greenberg attended services; Koufax did not. Boudreau publicly denied his Jewishness until the last years of his life. Green, the premier Jewish ballplayer of this era, has played and prayed depending on the year and the situation of his team.

Why believe Braun will take off on Yom Kippur?

Perhaps it's his connection to Greenberg: Braun lived for a time with his maternal grandfather in a house that once belonged to the legendary Detroit Tigers' slugger.

Then there is the interview Braun gave to the Milwaukee Jewish Sentinel.

"Being Jewish is something I take great pride in," he told the paper. "There aren't too many Jewish athletes who have achieved success at the highest level, so it's something I'm very proud of."

Of course, there is at least one good reason to believe he will play: Milwaukee is in the thick of a tight three-team race for the Central Division title and would hate to lose his bat, even for one night.

The Brewers aren't providing any clues; they haven't returned calls on the issue. So fans will just have to wait until Sept. 21 to find out if Braun will be wearing a uniform or a kippah.

Martin Abramowitz is the founding president of Jewish Major Leaguers, Inc., a not-for-profit organization "documenting American Jews in America's Game" (jewishmajorleaguers.org).

Baseball in Israel: If you build it, will they come?

By YANIV ORGAD
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — If the entire Israel Baseball League (IBL) season passed by non-English speaking Israelis without notice, they shouldn't feel bad. Though American spin doctors have woven wonders in election campaigns here, similar experts faced a tougher challenge in this case – introducing an unknown sport into the Israeli consciousness – and they failed. While some 3,000 people attended the opening ceremonies in Petah Tikva in late June, only half that number witnessed the championship game last week.

For the record, Beth Shemesh Blue Sox defeated Modi'in Miracle 3-0 to claim the league's inaugural championship.

"The league's bosses, American Jews, are dedicated but complete amateurs," said a journalist who covered the IBL over the past two months. "I gave them free advice to bring in someone like [Maccabi Tel Aviv captain] Avi Nimni to throw out the first pitch for one of the games. They said 'Good,' but didn't do a thing," he recalled.

"Israelis just didn't come," admitted southpaw pitcher Ari Alexenberg, whose potential Major League career was cut short by his Shabbat observance. "I played here in Yarkon Field for the Petah Tikva Pioneers, and we played to practically empty seats."

Alexenberg said he was "a bit jealous of Bet Shemesh and Modi'in, which played at Kibbutz Gezer where the stands were full [200-500 people] and enjoyed the support of the American community in the area." It may or may not be coincidental that both the Blue Sox and the Miracle wound up in the championship game.

Channel 5's weekly broadcast lasted a month, but was cancelled due to financial disputes. Yet Channel 10 program host and sports commentator Ofer Shelah was full of praise. "It amuses me slightly that we Israelis are quick to judge how to market a sport about which we have no expertise," said Shelah, who anchored the games. "I was impressed by the level of the players and the atmosphere. There are also new leagues in the United States. Even the ABA [American Basketball Association] didn't look much better at the onset."

Leon Feingold, the 34-year-old hurler for the Netanya Tigers, once got a shot with the Cleveland Indians organization but was cut down by a pair of shoulder injuries. He is now a real estate broker and professional competitive eater in New York. He divides IBL players into three categories. "A third of the players can play high-level minor league ball, a third belong in this league, and a third are pure amateurs," he observed.

Each player received $1,000 a month and Feingold said that's comparable to salaries in the lower rungs of the minors. The league would have benefited from pitching and batting coaches, as well as team physiologists, he suggested.

Other noted problems include the umpiring, as well as the quality of food and accommodations in Kfar Hayarok, where the players stayed.

"The Jewish players suffered quietly because the league for them was Zionism," said one of the players from the Dominican Republic. "We simply went out every night to bars in Tel Aviv and the girls there compensated for everything."

"You can't judge the league by its first season," concluded Shelah. "The Israeli league can be a development league similar to the higher levels of minor league ball. Will this sport catch on in a soccer-mad country with such a different mentality? Only time will tell."

Are living wills still useful?

By MICHAEL GORDON

The Senior Side of Life

Some time ago, I wrote a CJN column on living wills in which I raised some concerns about their usefulness in helping individuals and family caregivers make end-of-life decisions when a person is no longer able to speak for himself or herself.

There has been a strong movement supporting living wills over the past three decades, and many organizations, facilities and health care spokespeople have promoted them as a useful method of assuring respect for the ethical principles of autonomy and consent to treatment. It was anticipated that if people stated what they would want under a given set of circumstances, those making decisions would know what to do, and this would respectfully eliminate uncertainty. Health care professionals believed living wills would translate into clearer decision-making in often trying situations that are sometimes fraught with family conflict and guilt.

But from laudable concept to real-world implementation, something went seriously awry. In addition to what appears to be a profound reluctance by individuals to document their wishes for the future, there is also the question of to whom a living will speaks – initially, doctors thought that since they were often consulted on the content of living wills, they would also clinically interpret them. But in most jurisdictions, the living will is directed to the surrogate decision-maker, usually a family member, rather than the doctor.

During the famous case of Terri Schiavo, some experts suggested that if she had written a living will, all the challenges that were undertaken by her family, community and religious groups, and governmental officials could have been avoided. After her case, organizations that provide documents such as living will "kits" experienced a surge in requests for them.

The July 3 issue of the prestigious Annals of Internal Medicine contained an article by Dr. Henry S. Perkins titled, "Controlling Death: The False Promise of Advance Directives" (advance directives are known in lay terms as living wills). His conclusion from reviewing 30 years of experience with living wills is that they haven't fulfilled their initial promise, which was to remove the uncertainty from end-of-life decisions and, therefore, to allow individuals to plan for their futures.

The author explores why living wills haven't fulfilled their promise. The reasons include the fact that few people actually fill them out, and physicians with whom patients and their families might wish to discuss the complex clinical events of end-of-life care are rarely meaningfully involved in such planning. As well, directives are often completed by individuals and family members, with perhaps a lawyer being involved, none of whom can discuss the implications of a directive's wording or what might occur in end-of-life situations. For example, panic might result in a family requesting a patient's transfer to an emergency room when the person might have indicated a preference to die at home in "dignity and comfort."

Another point made in the article is that the language used in living wills is often vague (e.g., "no heroics," "comfort care only," "dying with dignity"). Family members might interpret words or phrases differently, as might various health care providers.

The author feels that the uncertainty that often surrounds end-of-life care is best approached by open communication with those who will likely be involved in final decision-making. Difficult though they may be, discussions should focus on preferences, wishes and values. Such knowledge and understanding can help guide loving family members to do the "right thing," even in situations of complexity and uncertainty. Trying to capture it all in a written living will alone has not, so far, achieved those laudable and desirable goals, and and it's not likely to do so in the future.

Dr. Michael Gordon is medical program director of palliative care at Baycrest and co-author with Bart Mindszenthy of Parenting Your Parents (Dundurn Press).

Public funding has many benefits

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

There has been so much discussion in the general public about the possibility of Ontario provincial funding of Jewish day schools that it's worth discussing some of the potential consequences.

First, a word is in order for those of our families who are not involved in day school education. Our efforts to achieve funding for faith-based schools are not, in any way, an attack on public education. They are, in fact, an attempt to enhance public education by broadening it to include faith-based settings. In Israel, for example, all education is public, but parents can choose many different modes of state education, depending on their ideology and/or their pedagogic preference.

Another concern that parents have is that of accountability. This is really only a concern at the elementary level, since our secondary schools are already fully tied to ministry diploma requirements. Our elementary schools use ministry guidelines for the general studies curriculum, and our history of testing has demonstrated a very high rate of success among our children. If anything, a measure of accountability will only help us to bridge any gaps that might exist across the community of schools.

Now, let me wax philosophic for a moment. Aside from the immense cost benefit to our day school families, entering the sphere of public education has an added value. As frightened as we are of assimilation, healthy interaction with the broader environment and the majority culture is a positive force. As our students deepen their Jewish literacy and invigorate their identity in our schools, they can better appreciate the attachment that others have to their respective cultures. The reverse is also true. The stronger we know ourselves and demonstrate our pride in the rich legacy of Judaism, the more others can learn from us and deepen their respect for our great culture of history, customs, literature and spiritual values.

There is much to be gained from government funding of faith-based schools, and we must do everything we can to win this battle for fair funding this time around.

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Good-bye, little girl

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Life is so difficult to understand. As I write this article before Rosh Hashanah 5768, news reaches me that a little girl of four years old in our community has passed away.

Today that child will be buried. Today it is sunny. Today is another 24-hour period when we go about the business of living.

I am thinking about life as we get closer to the yamim tovim. Today's thoughts are heavier than yesterdays, when I know that a little life has left our earth, her body riddled with cancer, her family full of grief.

And I extrapolate this piece of news for the rest of the world and remember that the little one I speak of is one of thousands who will perish today – some from disease; others from war, the ultimate in human neglect.

And I look up at the sky with great curiosity, my eyes moist, considering what this thing we call life is all about. It is so confusing. What do I do with this information as I prepare for the High Holy Days? A little girl? The questions are endless. The answers – I don't know.

Soon we will stand before God and praise Him, and do tshuvah (repentance) for the things we have done wrong. We will apologize to the people we hurt and to ourselves, and ask the community, the world, to consider that we did our best – or that we could have done much better – in response to the cries of those suffering today, just as we expected from the world when our families were perishing in the Holocaust.

Then, we might consider switching the communication around. Once we have completed our supplication, we might ask God, our Partner in existence, for some sort of explanation for all of the things that occur around us that seem so very, very wrong.

A story is told of a man who did exactly that on the High Holy Days. Before the High Holy Days, he would write his list of sins on one side of his journal, and on the other, the terrible things that had happened in the world that day.

The man would then stand straight and tall, tapping his chest while he read over the inequities he had committed against others, against the earth and against God. Then he would say, "God we are partners in the world, and I approach You humbly, asking how it is that You allow anti-Semitism to spread; how You leave our tiny State of Israel so vulnerable and alienated; why You haven't stopped the mutilation of entire villages in Darfur; why You cause the devastating earthquakes and tornadoes.

"God, I stand before you asking for your forgiveness because I have hurt others and I have hurt myself. But I ask You, what do You have in mind for us as we go about trying to finish the work You have started? We are partners. Tell me."

Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are upon us. Prepare for them. Study. Learn. Be introspective. Wonder. Question. Then dress in white, and through your extraordinary energy, bring peace and splendour to this world we share. And hope that our Partner does the same.

Let us hope and pray that in 5768 and forevermore, those who have suffered at the hands of others will experience joy, and that the perpetrators of pain and suffering will be marginalized and stymied as they consider their next actions.

Let us hope and pray that 5768 is an exemplary year for personkind when our partnership with God is clarified and the world we live in blossoms with peace and goodness. Shanah tovah.

Good-bye, little girl. Watch over us.

Our opportunity to make things right

Editorial

At the edge of the water, where breezes blow and the distant horizon suggests the vastness of place and of human hope, the people in the accompanying photos recite the prayers of Tashlich.

It is the afternoon of the first day of Rosh Hashanah. The sun is low in the sky, but not yet at its edge.

"And You will cast (V'tashlich) their sins away into the far depths of the sea," the men and the women intone emphatically as they empty their pockets of the crumbs and other clinging motes that they wish to remove.

In the first afternoon of the new year, unless it falls on the Shabbat, in which case it is on the new year's second afternoon, individuals gather near a body of water and symbolically cast their sins away. It is a tangible act of personal intention to start afresh.

It is a custom, most scholars believe, that has developed from medieval times. The core of the brief but poignant ceremony is a passage from the prophet Micah (7:18-20), which beseeches God to pardon and forgive, to be merciful and to have compassion for His imperfect creations – us.

If only it were that easy to be rid of the behaviours, the weaknesses, the frailties and the vanities that we call our sins! Mostly these sins are wounds we inflict on others. And all sins against human beings must perforce be sins against God, too.

They are therefore seldom as light or as insubstantial as the crumbs we carry in our pockets. They cannot so easily be cast aside.

But we must try.

Whether standing at the edge of a body of water or sitting in the midst of a synagogue sanctuary crammed and cramped with High Holy Day worshippers, these 10 days of Yamim Nora'im are our latest opportunity to start, at least, to "make things right."

Standing up for Jewish honour

It is in the fall, when Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are upon us, that the people of our community undertake serious reflection on the year that has passed and consider the challenges and opportunities in the year to come.

As the new co-presidents of Canadian Jewish Congress, we look back with respect on the achievements of our predecessors, and we look forward to doing our part to strengthen Jewish life in Canada.

The last year has included many significant achievements for the Jewish community – continued and further strengthened relations with Canada's First Nations people; significant successes in bringing perpetrators of hate to justice; a strong voice urging action to eliminate the suffering of the people of Darfur; seeking justice and dignity for Holocaust survivors; and challenging and confronting the menace of Islamo-fascism in all its guises, to name but a few. These achievements reflect our community's engagement on matters of human rights and social justice, with the hope of leaving the world better than how we inherited it from those who came before us.

We are blessed to live in a country where the rule of law is paramount, and where Canadian values are reflected in people from many faiths, ethnicities and cultures living together in relative harmony. At the same time, we cannot take that harmony for granted. We have all seen or heard about incidents of anti-Semitism in our streets and on the Internet, dangerous statements from regimes demonizing Israel and incendiary verbal and written attacks by representatives of fringe communities whose views are contrary to Canadian and Jewish values. For some people, attacks of this kind spur vigilant awareness of those around them, leading them to work to counteract the hatred, perhaps by building relationships with people from communities outside their own in an effort to develop trust and understanding. Unfortunately, for many others, coming face to face with hatred and enmity leads to a sense of defeat and apathy, which can devastate a community.

As Jews, we have learned the hard way that silence in the face of adversity is not an option.

Baker asks for prayers, help to free Israeli captives

Ambassador enthusiastic about relationship between Canada, Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

No one will ever confuse Israeli ambassador Alan Baker for the Man in Black, but like legendary country singer Johnny Cash, Baker's been everywhere, man.

Nunavut, Yellowknife, St. John's, Sydney, Regina, Whitehorse, Dawson City. The roving ambassador would put to shame the average Canadian's knowledge of his own country, visiting places both remote and near. He even found an untended Jewish cemetery in Dawson City that dates back to the Gold Rush days.

As he concludes the third year of a four-year posting, Baker is satisfied, even enthusiastic, about the relationship between Canada and Israel, calling it "very supportive" and "close."

The two countries share many important characteristics, putting them on the same page when it comes to identifying and addressing international issues, he said. Both are democracies that welcome immigrants and diverse cultures, and both are facing the same sort of threat from Islamic extremism. For Canada, it's the battle versus the Taliban in Afghanistan. For Israel, it's Hamas and Hezbollah.

Baker, who was involved with peace negotiations with the Palestinians prior to being posted in Ottawa, said the past year saw a strengthening of bilateral relations through high-level exchanges (the countries' foreign affairs ministers traded visits), continuing dialogue on security issues and the prospective trip to the Jewish state by Canada's new foreign affairs minister, Maxime Bernier.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Baker said, "has a soft spot for Canada," and he particularly enjoyed a visit here in 2003 as deputy prime minister.

Olmert "is very favourable to growing the relationship" and had hoped to visit earlier this summer, but the trip was cancelled over scheduling issues, Baker said.

A number of steps taken by the Harper government have brought the two countries closer together, he continued. Among them was its decision to refuse recognition of the Hamas government unless it abandoned terrorism and agreed to abide by previous agreements with Israel.

Honest marketplace currency

From the editor's desk

One of the acutely sinister and malign developments of recent decades in the constantly contentious debate surrounding Israel's conflict with the Palestinians (and most of the Arab world) has been the increasing acceptance of questioning the very idea of a Jewish state.

The recurring resort to the term "apartheid" in academic, journalistic and political discourse as a descriptor of Israel – its government and its policies – is stark evidence of the emboldened attacks on Zionism and of the ignorance or malevolence, or both, of the attackers.

For those of us who grew up in a post-World War II world existentially and morally secured by the existence and acceptance of a tiny Jewish state on its own part of the ancient Mediterranean shore, the world now seems existentially shakier and morally inverted.

Apart from a courageous few on campus and among editorialists, the vendors of anti-Israel venom have successfully elbowed their way into the "free marketplace of ideas" and taken over most of the stalls, their wares being poison propaganda or rigid, templated ideological responsa to complex questions.

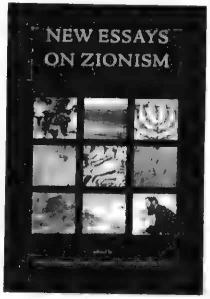
It is thus very gratifying indeed that into this marketplace-battlefield, the Shalem Center, the Jerusalem-based research and educational institute (which was the subject of this column last week), has recently published New Essays on Zionism.

The book is an anthology of "constructive works," in the words of the editors, on the subject of Zionism that, it is hoped, will "begin a discussion whose ultimate purpose is to provide the intellectual framework for a revival [of Jewish national sentiment.]"

The foreword of the book is reproduced elsewhere in this issue of The CJN in the Rosh Hashanah Greetings supplement. Written by Yoram Hazony, a senior fellow at the centre, it unmincingly spells out the alarming background for the genesis of the work.

"Is it important that there be a Jewish state? [italics in original] It is now evident that this matter is not settled at all. The majority of Jews and their friends may still offer instinctive and unthinking support for the idea of the Jewish state. But with increasingly frequency, one hears the voices of Jews and non-Jews whose answer to this question is in the negative."

The editors of the book, Hazony; his brother David, the editor-in-chief of Azure, and Michael B. Oren, a senior fellow at the centre, have compiled (and contributed to) a collection of 15 essays.



The essays are divided into three subject areas: the Jewish State and Political Theory, Zion and the Crisis of Jewish Culture, and Zion and History.

They are assertive, hard-hitting, straightforward and in many instances unflatteringly self-critical. But they are also staunchly and aggressively supportive of the belief that it is important that there be a Jewish state.

The writers themselves are very skilled writers of penetrating insight and bold thought. They bring expertise and knowledge from a cross-section of interconnecting disciplines.

And the most refreshing aspect of all the essays is that none of them is an apologia.

Two of Israel's most distinguished legal minds are among the contributors to the anthology.

Ruth Gavison, presently a member of the Winograd Commission investigating the political and military "failures" of the Second Lebanon War, and a professor of law at Hebrew University, provides a tightly reasoned legal response to the question of whether it is possible to justify the existence of a Jewish state?

Amnon Rubinstein, president of the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya and an Israel Prize recipient, writes about the inherent compatibility of Israeli democracy and Israeli nationalism.

Both Gavison and Rubinstein however, warn about the need to ensure the legal and practical protection of minority rights within the democracy.

Anna Isakova, a doctor, journalist and author writes about her often painful and poignant experiences integrating into Israeli society, after her arrival at a relatively young age from Lithuania. Her biting account is as heart-rending and eye-opening as it is informative.

In an essay provocatively titled Imagine: On Love and Lennon, Ze'ev Maghen, a senior lecturer in Middle Eastern and Islamic History at Bar Ilan University, confronts the challenge of connecting with our disconnected, alienated, uninformed and generally drifting Jewish youth.

Happily, the collection of essays arrives on the scene as many of our children are returning to, or entering for the first time, the anti-Israel proving grounds that many campuses in North America have become. New Essays on Zionism will help equip them to answer the lies that are passing as truth. The book is honest currency replacing counterfeit in the shadowy marketplace of ideas.

It is an important, stimulating read.

TanenbaumCHAT opens doors

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Hundreds of people flocked to the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's new northern branch on Sunday to celebrate the school's official opening.

Parents and students who attended the ceremony at TanenbaumCHAT at the Kimel Family Education Centre, were in awe of the 110,000-square-foot, $30-million building.

Before members of the community were urged to tour the school, those who have had a hand in building TanenbaumCHAT spoke about the significance of the new campus.

David Engel, the chair of the board of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said that the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus is the realization of a dream to create a "Jewish city" within York Region that will benefit generations of York's Jewish community.

"York Region is a very special place in the world. Unlike most urban centres in North America… the York Region Jewish community is thriving and growing. In fact, York Region has taken its place as the fastest growing Jewish population anywhere outside of Israel," Engel said.

"Take this gift from the community – parents, students, teachers – take this gift, look around the room and visualize, make a better future, dedicate yourself to this province, dedicate yourself to Jewish peoplehood, and make sure that the investment in this gift was well worth it," said Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of UJA Federation.

Paul Shaviv, TanenbaumCHAT's director of education, talked about the importance of helping young Jews create meaningful connections to Judaism.

"At our school, we want our students to perceive their Jewishness as a song, with a personal, spiritual meaning… that they will love, that they will remember, that they will enjoy," Shaviv said.

In recognition of two of the many donors who funded the construction of the school, Anne Tanenbaum and the Kimel family were presented with plaques in honour of their philanthropy.

When Warren Kimel and his wife, Debbie, rose to accept the plaque on behalf of their family, they received a standing ovation.

Kimel said that when he was approached with the request to give a gift to this ambitious project, he discussed with his family – his parents and siblings – about the prospect of giving to a cause that would have a significant impact on the community for years to come.

"With TanenbaumCHAT, we knew firsthand what an incredible school this is," he said.

The ceremony ended on a high note, with the Hachnasat Sefer Torah procession, but not before Shaviv reminded those in attendance about a key political issue – funding for faith-based schools.

"Our students should be part of the public school system, accountable like all other students… and paid for out of their parents' tax dollars," he said, adding that this system works in countless other communities, so "let's do it here."

Since 1922, 85 years of dedication and commitment.

An new social heroism

That the Tashlich ceremony takes its name and its essential pleadings from the teachings of the prophet Micah cannot be merely the result of serendipitous or coincidental associative terminology.

The rabbis who initiated the Tashlich rite knew quite well that Micah was also the propounder of one of the Bible's most important and best remembered summary statements of ethical and moral behaviour.

"It has been told to you,
Mankind,
What is good
And what God demands of you:
Behaving justly,
And the love of mercy,
And to walk humbly with your God." (6:8)

Thus, it stands to reason that in suggesting to us that our sins could be cast away, perhaps the rabbis were also suggesting to us how we might do so.

That is, we must act according to the timeless prescription that our prophets strove with all their might and divine inspiration to impress into our hearts – ethically, morally, justly.

The sins of unethical, immoral and unjust behaviour, of indifference and disregard to the condition of one's fellow man, are surely an affront to God.

But are they not first an affront to humanity?

The late Rabbi Eliezer Berkovits, the remarkable scholar, philosopher and teacher who died 15 years ago on the 22nd of Av, wrote extensively about the nature and importance of moral behaviour in Judaism. (The Shalem Center in Jerusalem has recently embarked on a project to republish his writings.)

In an essay, Zion and Moral Vision, exploring Rabbi Berkovits' theology, David Hazony observed that "the yardstick of morality in Judaism, according to Berkovits, is not our adherence to a set of ideas or beliefs, but the results of our actions, and by extension, the kind of society we help create."

It is precisely these questions – what will be our personal actions and what will be the society we create? – that we must ponder at this time of year.

The burnished and shining qualities we hope to find in the world, we must first find in ourselves.

The exemplary behaviours we expect, if not demand, to see in others, we must first practise ourselves.

Thus, we cannot cast away our sins, even in the time-worn, symbolism-laden ceremony of Tashlich, unless we determine first to "behave justly, love mercy, and act with humility," unless we determine to elevate goodness and kindness into the new social heroism.

At least we must try.

And as we do, we must also thank God for bringing us to this day, to this New Year and to the possibility, once again, of a fresh start.

Chag samayach.

Greetings from Stéphane Dion

On behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada and our parliamentary caucus, I would like to extend warm greetings to all Canadians observing Rosh Hashanah in the coming days.

These High Holy Days signify new beginnings. They represents a time of celebration, looking back at the past months and welcoming the ones ahead in anticipation of a sweet new year.

For Jews around the world, this is a time for prayer, introspection and close family gatherings. For all Canadians, it is also a time to reflect on the values that unite us, the values that our country was founded on, and like the blowing of the shofar, show the world that Canada is a beacon of hope for all: we are a country that respects the beliefs of all, that treats its citizens fairly and that is filled with opportunity.

With these thoughts, I wish you Shanah Tovah.

Shabbat and the environment

I read with interest the supplement on Jewish attitudes to the environment. The Torah commands Adam to "work and guard" the Garden of Eden ("Community Focus," CJN, Aug. 23). That is our responsibility as well – to work and guard our Garden of Eden.

There is another purely Jewish initiative that we could all undertake. We could designate one day a week as Shabbat, our day of cessation. On this day we would not drive our cars and not use our ovens, washing machines, dishwashers, major appliances, televisions and computers. This observance of Shabbat and holidays would reduce our gas consumption and electricity for 65 days a year.

This would be a uniquely Jewish and quite dramatic personal contribution to energy reduction, and one that we are all capable of undertaking.

To the Liberal caucus

To the members of the Liberal caucus who issued their New Year's greetings to the Jewish community in the CJN: over the past few weeks, you have portrayed any effort to fund faith-based schools as liable to foment "public unrest," and you have used such charged terms as "segregationist" to describe our schools.

In fact, our schools are the lifeblood of our community, and our community would not continue to exist without its schools. The fact that the Catholics get full funding in Ontario, to the exclusion of all others, is a moral travesty. Excuses that this situation is based in history are lame, since no other province in Canada provides full funding to the schools of one religion to the exclusion of all others. Ontario is unique in this regard – in Canada, and in the entire western world.

Many members of our community, my family included, are not wealthy and are buckling under the financial strain of sending our children to the schools of our faith. The fact that Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty's family was able to avail itself of publicly funded faith-based education, while others are not, is not lost on us. Families such as mine are worried about our financial future and about how our children will be able to raise their own families in this province, given the extreme financial pressures. Surely, this is not the type of cohesive society that you often talk about.

Under such circumstances, and with the inflamed rhetoric coming from you and your party of late, there is no way at all that I can accept your New Year's greetings.

'Partners' in quest for day school funding

Ira Walfish in his comments regarding my letter to the editor implies that my concern is Jewish day schools may potentially indoctrinate their students into becoming jihadists ("Funding issues of faith-based schools, CJN letters, Sept. 6). This is of course complete nonsense.

Clearly he refuses to acknowledge there is an important issue being ignored when it comes to the demand for provincial funding of all faith-based schools in Ontario.

It is an unpleasant business, but it needs to be addressed. Have a good look at many of the "partners" that he Jewish community is making common cause with in its quest for full provincial funding. The question is will these "partners" be teaching their children tikkun olam (repair of the world) or will they be teaching them jihad (holy war against infidels)?

What might be the impact on Ontario's Jewish community if the imams who now receive their salaries and instructions from Arabia were also to control an enlarged, publicly funded school system. This is an issue that too few people want to talk about in the Jewish community. This issue will not go away simply because it is ignored. The Jewish community's best bet remains greatly improved Hebrew afternoon schools.

Indifference, not apostasy, is the threat

He's not the only Christian who regularly attends services at the synagogue in Jerusalem to which I belong, but he is unique in that he was born a Jew. After coming on aliyah to study at Hebrew University, he found Christianity. Today he is a respected member of the Jesuit community in Israel.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Blessed with enormous charm and a brilliant mind, he has deployed both attributes in teaching his faith as well as promoting mutual respect and understanding between Muslims, Christians and Jews. Well regarded in many circles in the Middle East, his personal friends include practising Jews, some of whom are rabbis.

Not long ago I wrote in this column about a Polish priest who as an adult discovered that his birth parents were Jews and later connected with his father's surviving family in Israel. In addition to his work as an academic, he has become a most effective exponent of interfaith dialogue in his country. He is one of the most attractive human beings it has been my privilege to know, and I am proud to consider him a friend.

I thought about both men when I read about the recent death of Cardinal Jean-Marie Lustiger. He, too, was born a Jew and embraced Christianity as a teenager during World War II. Despite lingering open hostility from some Jews, Cardinal Lustiger always insisted that his Christian faith in no way diminished his Jewish status. He counted many prominent Jews among his personal friends. At his funeral in Notre Dame Cathedral in Paris, Kaddish was recited by one of his Jewish relatives. Another read a Psalm in Hebrew and French.

A few years ago, Cardinal Lustiger was in Toronto and a Catholic student of mine tried to arrange a meeting between us. Unfortunately, it did not take place. I deeply regret not having had the opportunity to meet this remarkable man.

When Jews lived as persecuted minorities, every conversion to Christianity was viewed as betrayal – apostasy in the fullest sense of the word. Today, when Jews are equal citizens virtually everywhere in the Diaspora, and Israel is a Jewish state, they can afford to recognize that an individual Jew may embrace another religion out of conviction, not to betray his or her Jewish heritage. In the same way as we have learned to welcome with open arms those who have chosen to become Jews, so we must respect Jews who have found their vocation within another faith.

Today, the real threat to Judaism is not the conversion of a few Jews to another religion, but the cynical indifference by many Jews to all religion, and their willingness to live by the godless mores of our time.

Students must speak out for Israel

Israel is the biggest challenge facing Jewish student leaders as they return to school this month – not the country, but the issue of how it is perceived on campus and how to deal with it.

I'm sure the Jewish Students' Association in Ottawa would like to talk about many issues, from ensuring kosher food is available in the cafeteria to building its outreach programs, but it all comes back to Israel.

Mark Masters in Ottawa

You cannot escape it.

The problem is many people on campus use Israel as an excuse to undermine Jewish students' opinions and avoid addressing issues important to our community.

In my first year at Carleton, I was pledging Alpha Epsilon Pi, the Jewish fraternity. When I headed out to an event one night, I was taken aback when the friend of my roommates asked accusingly if we were going to build any walls. The question was in reference to the controversy surrounding the security barrier that Israel was constructing at the time.

I found it odd that everything people thought Israel was doing wrong half a world away was seamlessly downloaded as the fault of every Jewish student on campus.

Regardless of whether Israel is right or wrong in pursuing its own policy decisions, there is no sense in punishing individuals for the perceived crimes of a nation-state.

Do Christian students get blamed for perceived errors made by the U.S. government? Are Muslim students targeted for any number of the human rights abuses perpetrated by predominantly Muslim countries in the Middle East?

Most students I encounter at Carleton and the University of Ottawa are apolitical. They don't want to get dragged into the petty and oftentimes personal life of campus politics. They don't want to protest, they don't want to shout, they just want to get their degree, have a good time and get out.

However, they are still forming their opinions about global politics during their time on campus, even if it is subconsciously. The problem is, the information they are getting is coming from the small percentage of politicos on campus who are loud, in-your-face and, simply put, not sympathetic to Israel. The "apartheid wall" must fall, the illegal occupation must end, and the ethnic cleansing of the Palestinian people must be stopped. This is the rhetoric that fills the halls year after year.

In Ottawa, the Jewish response on campus has not been coherent, has not been loud and has not been heard.

Two years ago, the Israel Awareness Club at Carleton was distributing literature on campus calling for the end of terrorist attacks against innocent civilians in Israel. The literature was banned by the Carleton University Students' Association, and the head of the club was called into the president's office for a tongue lashing. The images, he was told, were too violent to be distributed. They were upsetting Muslim students.

This should have been cause for outrage. I was editor-in-chief of the campus newspaper at the time. I found out what had happened, but chose not to create a controversy. I was afraid of how it would be perceived if a Jewish editor started a fuss about pro-Israeli activism. I made a mistake. We have to stop making these mistakes.

And herein lies the problem. As a community on campus, we have at times shied away from talking directly about Israel because we are afraid of being seen as creating trouble or being radical and therefore being discredited.

I have come to a realization. We need to be honest with ourselves. Israel is our heart. It's at the centre of who we are. It's our home – the Jewish state.

While we should not ignore other issues, we must focus on Israel. If we can ensure Israel is getting a fair shake on campus, that will open other doors and increase the profile of Jewish groups on campus and help build our network.

Starting right now, no criticism of Israel in campus politics or the campus press can go unanswered. No anti-Israel event can go on without criticism, and plenty of events must be held promoting the Israeli side – not just its culture but its politics.

After all, Israel connects us. It has to be the centrepiece for what we do on campus.

Lots of possibilities for Jewish students

I had a plan. I was going to leave the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (better known as CHAT), leave Toronto, leave my parents and all of my friends and go to Halifax for the year. I was going to enrol in the University of King's College, study hard and learn as much as I could. At the end of my first year, I was going to transfer to the University of Western Ontario for the year, and following that, I would go to Israel.

Jesse Mintz in Halifax

Nowhere in my plans did falling in love with Halifax fit. However, here we are – I am now preparing to return to Halifax for my third year.

Most people may read this and think that I've missed out, that I should have taken any opportunity for a change of scenery and to travel. But few people realize that Halifax can meet and surpass the needs – social, academic and Jewish – of incoming students.

I'm not writing this to convince anyone that Halifax is the city for them. That's something people must discover on their own. I'm writing this to inform nervous first-year students – and their anxious parents – of the amenities Halifax has to offer. Halifax is neither a Jewish cultural hub, nor is it the most popular Jewish student destination; however, it does provide all the necessities of a young and energetic Jewish community.

-First and foremost for me, Halifax took me out of my comfort zone. This may sound scary for some, but rest assured, it offers the opportunity to grow and mature as a person. In Toronto, I was reminded daily of my Judaism by friends and school, and was given a strong grounding in Jewish tradition by my family. Judaism was never a personal choice for me.

After moving to Halifax, I found myself uprooted. Most of my friends were studying at Western, my family was in Toronto, and my school was no longer a Jewish institution. For the first time in my life, the question of religiosity, and even affiliation, became a personal one. Such seemingly obvious choices like which synagogue to attend and where to break the fast had new meaning for me, as I now had to make the choice.

Throughout the year, the wonderfully diverse mosaic of Jewish life in Halifax became more and more apparent as I struggled to sculpt my own Judaism. The synagogue – the epicentre of Jewish life next to the home – was an obvious first step for me. Halifax offers two synagogues, Beth Israel and Shaar Shalom, both of which are welcoming to students.

At the synagogue I attended, I was personally greeted by the rabbi and invited to lunch with him after services. His graciousness was extended not only to me, but also to many other students who lacked a proper meal. His family has welcomed me into their home to dine several times since then – including for a Passover seder – and I look forward to the rebbetzin's delicious brisket every time.

It seems that all a Jewish student has to do to find other Jews nearby is to hang a mezuzah on the door. Within one week of classes starting, I had a Jewish Student Association (JSA) member at my door informing me of everything Jewish in Halifax, from where to get the best kosher challah to when the next Chabad Shabbat dinner would be. The JSA, as it turns out, also hosts numerous events throughout the year, some social, some educational.

In first year, I tried to avoid eating cafeteria food. I was thrilled to learn that in Halifax, it is a rarity for a single Friday night dinner to pass without a home-cooked Shabbat meal offered to students somewhere. Between synagogue events, JSA dinners and parties, and Chabad Shabbat meals, first-year students can avoid cafeteria food at least one night a week.

The most important issue that I've faced in my two years in Halifax, an issue I hope to expand on in my remaining two years, is the question of how to make Judaism my own. Removed from my mother's kosher kitchen and my family's Shabbat table, I have to decide what elements within Judaism I want to embrace. Halifax has the facilities to help me with this decision.

The Kirshner File

Letter from Tel Aviv

From the 49th-floor enclosed observatory of one of the Azrieli towers, conceived and built by Montreal real estate tycoon David Azrieli, Tel Aviv shimmers under a hot Middle Eastern summer sun. The world's first all-Jewish city, which marks its centenary in two years, is a megalopolis, blending seamlessly into Jaffa, Bat Yam, Ramat Gan, Ramat Aviv and Givatayim. From this elevation, residential buildings look squat and blinding white. Skyscrapers, the hallmark of modern Tel Aviv, poke into the pale blue sky.

Sheldon Kirshner in Israel

The Mediterranean Sea, Tel Aviv's finest asset, sparkles in the brilliant sunshine. The low mountain range of the West Bank – the redoubt of Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas since Fatah's blood-soaked split with Hamas in June – appears hazy. The Ayalon expressway, speckled with hurtling vehicles, is an undulating black ribbon.

At street level, Tel Aviv comes into clearer focus.

Dizengoff Square, designed by Genia Averbuch, built in 1934 and once considered the nerve centre of Tel Aviv cafe society, is a pale imitation of its former self. The construction of an overpass in 1978 ruined the ambience of this iconic piece of real estate. Some say that the mistake will be rectified some day soon. Let us hope so.

Tel Aviv, with a view of the busy Ayalon expressway, shimmers in a Mediterranean sun.

Sheinkin Street, an artery off sedate, tree-shaded Rothschild Boulevard, is a mix of cosmopolitan cafes and restaurants, fancy boutiques, chic shops, drab grocery stores and crumbling Bauhaus apartments. It is the heart and soul of the secular kingdom of Tel Aviv, as some wags in Jerusalem – Tel Aviv's rival – describe it. Yet unusually enough, haredim can also be found on Sheinkin Street, walking from their homes to neighbourhood synagogues and institutions.

Call it live and let live, an attitude sometimes in short supply in Israel.

The Carmel Market is a few minutes away by foot. The city's largest and oldest outdoor bazaar, it is a kaleidoscope of sights and a cacophony of sounds. Plump and aromatic fruits and vegetables, ranging from green grapes and apricots to cherry tomatoes and zucchini, attest to Israel's virtual self-sufficiency in food production. The variety of olives, glistening in marinade, is astonishing. The vast array of cheese under glass invites comparisons to Paris. Fresh mounds of breads, rolls and pitas impart a heady aroma. The cakes, chocolates and candies on display are tantalizing. Merchants shout, praising their goods in sing-song fashion.

The Hassan Bek mosque, near the market and close to the luxurious David Inter-Continental Hotel, is a reminder of things past. Prior to the 1948 Arab-Israeli war, this section of southern Tel Aviv was the northernmost extension of the Palestinian Arab town of Jaffa. Once hostilities ended, the neighbourhood was abandoned and fell into disrepair and disrepute. The mosque, with its distinctive minaret, mouldered away in silence as land speculators shamelessly lobbied to convert it into an upscale shopping mall.

Today, everything is different. New commercial buildings have sprouted, and the mosque, with its cool garden, has been renovated and put back into service as a house of prayer. On the day I was there, five Arab men knelt on a carpet, facing Mecca in supplication.

Seconds by foot from the mosque is Tel Aviv's spruced up beach-front promenade, which is named after Shlomo Lahat, the mayor of Tel Aviv from 1974 to 1993, and is perfect for strolling.

The sandy beaches across the street from the Dan Hotel brim with bathers sitting on folding chairs and under umbrellas. This pleasant stretch of sand meeting the roar of the surf gives Tel Aviv a real Mediterranean feel. On a rocky outcrop pounded by the sea, two amiable African men lean against a marble monument commemorating the 1948 Altalena incident, during which Israeli forces, commanded by a future prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin, fired on a ship carrying Irgun fighters and war materiel. The inscription is bland and non-confrontational, as if nothing of historical importance ever occurred in this briny part of Tel Aviv nearly 60 years ago.

The American Embassy, walled off and doubly protected by concrete barriers to ward off a possible terrorist attack, faces the sea. It is next to Mike's jazz bar, which was bombed by two British Pakistani suicide bombers a few years ago, at the height of the second Palestinian uprising.

The Hassan Bek mosque on the edge of Jaffa

Jaffa's famous promontory, a staple of coffee-table books lauding the charms of Tel Aviv, is easily seen from here. Formerly the beating heart of Palestinian nationalism, Jaffa is now a melange of old and new.

The Turkish clock tower at the foot of Yefet Street dates from a time when the Ottoman Empire reigned supreme in Palestine. Winding cobblestone lanes in the refurbished artists' quarter, a haunt of drug addicts and prostitutes until the 1960s, lead to avant-garde art galleries and expensive private residences.

The Abulafia bakery, which serves up incredibly tasty pitas topped with fried eggs, pitted with baked olives and sprinkled with a fragrant herb known as zaatar, attracts customers from afar and is busy at all hours.

The flea market is alive with commerce. Amid prowling cats and the co-mingled odour of salt air and rotting garbage, tourists inspect hole-in-the-wall shops, examining kitschy souvenirs and haggling over prices.

Deeper inside Jaffa, where mainly Israeli Arabs live, the homes run the gamut from the neglected to the palatial.

The brightly lit branch of a Nazareth bakery displays super-sweet Arabic pastry dripping with honey and slathered with nuts.

At the Abu Nasser restaurant, a waiter brings delicious Middle Eastern appetizers to the table. As the sumptuous meal ends, the plaintive wail of a meuzzin in an adjacent mosque pierces the evening air.

On a quiet, nondescript street off Jerusalem Boulevard, Sana, a celebrity fortune teller of Arab and Jewish origin sporting bottled blonde hair and a discerning demeanour, pores over Turkish coffee grounds, shuffles tarot cards and divines the future in a 20-minute session. All for the equivalent of about $50. Is she a seer or a charlatan? Probably both.

On a Friday evening on the other side of town, in the shadow of the immense Reading power plant, the former port of Tel Aviv pulsates with joie de vivre. Its lively cafe scene, far removed from the days of austere Zionism, is emblematic of Tel Aviv's hedonistic lifestyle. Young and middle-aged couples sit in outdoor cafes on the boardwalk, contentedly sipping cold drinks and hot beverages, slurping sundaes and licking ice cream cones. Waves occasionally wash over the seawall, splashing passersby and causing a frisson of excitement.

Further south in the middle-class suburb of Bat Yam on a sultry, lazy Saturday afternoon, the wide, sandy beach is one of the big draws.

Black flags flap in the breeze, warning swimmers that the waters are rough and dangerous. Lifeguards in overhead cabins implore reckless bathers to return to shore immediately, lest they drown.

Along Ben-Gurion Street, cafes and restaurants, ranging in decor from simple to posh, cater to tourists and locals alike. Luxurious condominiums, some of which are apparently owned by French immigrants, rise on the sandy bluff. A skinny, pale orange cat, its tail sticking up straight and its ears pricked, slinks along the sidewalk, taking in the sights and looking for leftover falafels.

Riding is ground zero in faith-based funding debate

By RON CSILLAG
Special to The CJN

It's little surprise that in Ontario's most Jewish riding, the funding of faith-based, private schools is a hot issue. But so are transit and health care.

Thornhill

The 2001 census showed that Thornhill was 37 per cent Jewish, but officials believe the number today is closer to half. Represented since 2003 by Liberal Mario Racco, the riding is home to at least a dozen Jewish day schools, synagogues and religious outreach facilities.

Thornhill is bounded by Highway 404 in the east, Highway 400 in the west, Steeles Avenue in the south and Rutherford Road, Bathurst Street and Highway 7 in the north. The average family income is just over $100,000 a year, and unemployment is around five per cent.

Racco, who defeated the Conservative incumbent in 2003 by just 796 votes, concedes he's in a tough fight in Jewish neighbourhoods over his leader's refusal to extend public funds to private schools.

"I'm prepared to lose votes if I have to," said the 52-year-old MPP. "I don't want to lose any votes, but if I have to [risk being] called a liar or lose votes, quite frankly, I prefer to lose the votes."

Racco, like Premier Dalton McGuinty, said the publicly funded school systems needs improving first.

"But I have always been interested in hearing what I call reasonable ways of addressing the issue. Unfortunately, we hear two sides: 'No' and 'You must' [fund]. We cannot reach anything reasonable if we take this approach."

Asked what he meant by "reasonable," Racco replied: "It could be anything where people say, 'We believe the public system is the one that everybody, if they choose to, can go to. But if some of us decide that we want to provide a private school because of religious or personal reasons, then we would expect the province to appreciate our effort and potentially provide us some programming that you provide for the public system.'"

That type of apolitical approach "could lead to something," he added

Meanwhile, it's the premier and education minister who speak on the issue, he said.

"To suggest anything different, quite frankly, is playing politics, and I don't want to do that," Racco said. "This is too big an issue and too charged an issue for me to try to suggest that I would do something different. Nobody will be able to do something different than what the party wants."

Racco chafed at suggestions the Liberals have not delivered on health care and transit.

He pointed to a community health centre being built at Jane Street and Rutherford Road that's slated to open next spring and to be replaced by a full-fledged hospital within five years.

He also takes credit for the $2.1-billion extension of the subway into the City of Vaughan planned by 2020. "This is my project and nobody else's. It's mine."

Peter Shurman, a 59-year-old former radio executive and CFRB on-air personality, said he's heard from "many" Jewish voters who say they'll switch to his Progressive Conservatives for the party's $400-million proposal to fund the 53,000 Ontario children now attending non-Catholic religious schools.

"The overwhelming issue is what appears to be bias in Ontario," said Shurman, a Jewish ex-Montrealer who is making his first attempt at public office. "Even the United Nations said that Ontario's school system… is discriminatory.

I am the JEWISH Future

Inspiring Jewish identity

When I was younger, my dad used to tell me that I was the future of Jewish life. I never knew what he meant but I do now. I went to Israel for the first time this summer on birthright israel and I've really started thinking about what being Jewish really means.

Now that I'm back in Toronto, I want to continue being involved with Jewish life. That's why The Campaign for Our Jewish Future is so important.

One of the goals of the campaign is to inspire Jewish identity by creating a series of programs like CampRight, which will give all kids the chance to go to a Jewish summer camp.

Project 25/35 will create cutting-edge initiatives to address the needs – and wants – of young singles, young couples, young families and birthright israel alumni, just like me.

The Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education will expand the horizons – and the funding – of Jewish education in Toronto, while the Institute for New Jewish Leadership will recruit and nurture our community's future Jewish leaders.

Now that I finally feel connected to Israel and to Jewish life, The Campaign for Our Jewish Future is giving me the opportunity to stay connected. Who knows, maybe my dad was right, maybe I really am the future of Jewish life!

Liberal MPP faces challenge in Thornhill riding

"I would have a hard time offering an argument to Dalton McGuinty if he said he would scrap the Catholic system. But he's not saying that."

The Conservatives' proposal is to "include a system of schools that exists now [under] the public umbrella so that what you've got is a secular aspect of education that operates in parallel and at a common standard; that teaching standards are the same [as public schools]; that testing standards are the same; that even intramural sports are integrated so that what you've got is a reflection of the real Ontario and notably the GTA."

Shurman called the Liberals' health premium "the largest tax grab in the history of Ontario. It's not a premium. It's a tax. It's generated about $10 billion, [which] has not been earmarked for health, and I defy anyone to tell me the health system has improved in any marked way in the last four years. Arguably, it's deteriorated."

Making her first foray into politics is New Democratic Party hopeful Sandra Parrott, a 51-year-old former employee of the York Region District School Board and the Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

For the past 27 years, Parrott has lived in Thornhill Green Co-Operative Homes, and she says affordable housing and the rights of the disabled are priorities.

So are the need for dedicated bus lanes in York Region, "a quicker fix than waiting for the subway to be built," she told The CJN. "We can't wait 20 years."

The NDP, she said, supports "fixing" funding formulas for public and separate schools, and Parrott leaves the door open to the possible funding of private schools.

"Once you can at least get a grip on funding and have the two systems that are existing right now flowing properly, then I think you can start looking at other alternatives. Once the formula is fixed, then I think you can open the doors to everybody else and even it all out," she said.

"But I don't know how you can open the floodgates to more now, when it's already broken."

To shore up the NDP's traditionally low support in Thornhill, "we're going to start real grassroots and just work our way up. I'm well aware [the riding] is either going to be PC or Liberal because of the way the money goes," Parrott said.

Also running in Thornhill is the Green Party's Lloyd Helferty, who ran in the riding in last year's federal election and received 1,934 votes, or 3.4 per cent of ballots cast. Provincially in Thornhill, the Green Party received 705 votes in the last election, or 1.5 per cent of the total.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

> "In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
> The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
> Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Perfume and produce for Rosh Hashanah

By JULIEN BAUER

Guest Voice

The days leading to Rosh Hashanah are marked in Jerusalem by two approaches, a mercantile-business one and a religious-political one.

The mercantile aspect is omnipresent. On radio, on TV, in the written media, there is an unending avalanche of publicity for everything that is apparently needed to celebrate the new year.The obvious priority is food, every kind of food from every company and every grocery chain, with heavy emphasis on wine and honey.

Less obvious is publicity for clothing: how can you celebrate Rosh Hashanah without a new dress? More remote from my idea of what the Yamim Nora'im, the High Holy Days, mean is the publicity for perfume. The message is clear: spend money and enter the new year in an atmosphere of consumerism.

The religious-political approach is quite different – 5768 is a shmittah year, a sabbatical year in which it is forbidden to work the land.

Shmittah is perceived quite differently by different groups of Israelis. There are three main groups: those who don't care, those who adhere strictly to it and those who adapt it to modern circumstances.

According to surveys, about 60 per cent of Israelis do not relate to shmittah, do not know its meaning and are not interested in it. This is the first group.

The second group, the haredim, strive to apply all the laws of shmittah meticulously. During the seventh year, they insist, the land will remain unworked, enabling farmers to study Torah. In total, about 20,000 farmers apply the laws of shmittah and receive both public and private funds to support them in doing so. Haredi consumers rely on special hechsherim, certifications, stating that produce has been grown according to the laws of shmittah, i.e., either coming from non-Jewish farmers in Israel or from neighbouring Arab states such as Jordan, Egypt and, of all places, Gaza.

In between these two groups are the religious Zionists. They want to follow shmittah regulations, but are aware of the negative impact it could have on Israeli society. This is why they use a legal device called heter mechira, devised before the creation of the state. In this case, Jewish farmers transfer ownership of their land to non-Jews. Jewish consumers are allowed to buy the produce, because the land on which it was grow was, at that time at least, not owned by Jews. The heter mechira was introduced in order to preserve Jewish agriculture in Israel.

Nowadays the respective positions concerning shmittah are becoming firmer.

At a recent symposium organized by Beit Avi Chai, the haredi college in Jerusalem, a surprising variety of positions and statements emerged about observing the laws of shmittah.

The left-wing Meretz party member of Knesset said he supported the haredi position. He was, of course, joined by the haredi representative, who refused to discuss the fact that buying from Gaza theoretically boosted Hamas, and theoretically, at least, weakened Jewish-Israeli agriculture.

The religious Zionist participant said he would prefer to strictly apply the laws of shmittah, but in the circumstances, preferred to keep the use of the heter mechira.

The discussion was fascinating and revealed deep undercurrents in Israeli society. Who is actually in charge, some participants asked.

Grocery stores purchase goods with a hechsher, a certification, provided by a local rabbi. If he rejects goods and produce that were bought by the store through the use of the heter mechira, the stores will have to buy produce from non-Jews, grown under the strictly applied laws of shmittah, and obviously at an inflated price.

But how can a local rabbi, authorized by the chief rabbinate, refuse to accept the heter that was created in the first place by that very same chief rabbinate?

These kind of questions – from what is the best perfume to buy for Rosh Hashanah to what does it mean to be a Jew in Israel? – make the days before Rosh Hashanah in Jerusalem very different than they are anywhere else.

I wish the readers of Canadian Jewish News and the Jewish people Ktivah vechatimah tovah. Have a good year.

Julien Bauer, professor of political science at the Université du Québec à Montréal, is on sabbatical in Jerusalem.

Don't shoot the messenger

By RABBI YEHIEL BENAYON

Through A Sephardi Window

They are calling him "the old idiot," the "Jewish Ayatollah" and one who has again succumbed to his chronic affliction of "foot-in-mouth disease" – and these are only a few of the printable quotes about him that can be found in the media. Elsewhere (everywhere?), he is vilified and ridiculed as a primitive relic of another era.

He is Rabbi Ovadiah Yosef, pre-eminent and world-renowned Torah scholar, author, former Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel, and the spiritual leader of Israel's third largest political party, which is also a powerful social movement. He presides over his own nationwide separate school system, which offers education from preschool to post-graduate studies. His guidance and his rulings are sought and respected in countries worldwide, and well beyond Sephardi Jews of Spanish and Middle Eastern origin.

And yet, once again, his comments, made during his popular late Saturday night discourses, have apparently managed to irk many people.

I, for one, will honestly admit that I have not seen the full text of the rabbi's lecture, as most certainly neither have any of his many complainants. But I understand that the ideas he expressed go something like this: God exists. God has certain expectations of mankind. Mankind will sometimes meet and exceed these expectations, and, being human, will sometimes fall short of these ideals. Both of these – the successes and the failures – will result in consequences that are, respectfully, good or bad.

So far, so good. After all, a rabbi is somewhat expected to – and even entitled to – dabble in theology.

But then the rabbi went on to say that this concept applies equally to the soldiers in the Israel Defence Forces. They, like the rest of us, are bound by this principle. Hence, their wounds and casualties are attributable to sin.

In this, Rabbi Yosef really didn't say anything new nor newsworthy. Belief in reward and punishment is part and parcel of the 13 fundamentals of our faith, right along with the belief in a single knowing and guiding God.

While this principle is found in all the midrashic, talmudic and rabbinic literature, its source is in the Torah, in whose verses it is found again and again, from the story of creation onward.

It's the right and duty of every religious educator to educate. At times, such instruction will inevitably displease, and indeed even anger, some people. But a true leader/educator will not change the nature of God's words for the temporary gain of false popularity.

The indignant cries and subsequent fallout over the rabbi's words are also neither new nor newsworthy. Our history, again beginning in the very verses of the Torah, records the deviations from, and uprisings against, our leadership. This is all nothing new. We Jews have at various times muted, incarcerated, exiled and even executed our own prophets, because their messages so displeased us.

It's easier to shoot the messengers than to deal with the message. Notwithstanding that, the words of God to us remain true, pure, immutable and undiluted.

Jewish Life

Prayers written for women

Books

Bernard Baskin

Hours of Devotion* by Fanny Neuda, edited by Dinah Berland, Random House.

Written in the mid-19th century, this compilation of prayers was the first Jewish prayer book for all occasions written by a woman for women.

The author, Fanny Neuda, who was married to a liberal rabbi, was educated in both secular and Judaic studies. Growing up in Moravia, the centre of the movement for religious change during the period of the Enlightenment, she was eager to bring the ideals and teaching of Judaism to women who were usually denied religious education.

Her unique prayer book was reprinted more than two dozen times in German, and appeared in Yiddish and English editions between 1855 and 1918. Then, surprisingly, it was largely forgotten until Dinah Berland, a poet and book editor, discovered it in a Los Angeles used bookstore.

For her, the book provided comfort as well as inspiration and served as a spur to her renewed interest in Jewish study and practice.

The volume contains 60 prayers that are gracefully and elegantly translated in poetic form. What is remarkable is the range and variety of the prayers – not only for the synagogue but also those for a new bride; on the approach of childbirth; for an unhappy wife; for a mother whose son is in military service; after withstanding danger; and for a mother whose children provide for her. There is also a group of memorial prayers and some for healing.

Dinah Berland writes, "Her personal devotions, each one imbued with deep humility and sincerity, an unwavering reverence for God, generosity toward the less fortunate, and compassion for human suffering, have the power to open the heart and lend courage to all readers – men as well as women, non-Jews and Jews alike. I will always be grateful to have discovered this book and to have been able to serve as a conduit for its rebirth so it might, with God's grace, help others as it has helped me."

The excerpts that follow are taken from longer prayers.

For an Unhappy Wife

Love does not dwell in my house,
And kindness does not live here.
Instead of mutual understanding,
All that thrives is the sullen spirit
Of conflict and argument.
Only discord and misunderstanding,
Along with their sad offspring, anger and pain,
Amble and wander through our home.
You, Almighty One – you who guide hearts
Like channels of water –
Draw our hearts toward each other,
Let our feelings come together in love and oneness,
Let them flow into each other. You who know
The deepest strings and stirrings of our beings,
Let the stones of our hearts ring there,
Against each other.
Let our hearts unite in harmony.
Let every ungodliness pass away from us
So peace might make its heavenly roof
Above our home again.
Let blessed trust and mutual care
Be a mighty shield around us,
And I shall rejoice and praise your name
Forever and ever. Amen

Erev Rosh Hashanah

With the first rosy glow of dawn
May we enter the new year
In a renewed, happier state of mind,
One that brings contentment and well-being
To us and to our loved ones –
Health and strength to our bodies,
Purity and good cheer to our souls,
Growth and prosperity to our children –
A blessed and productive year,
Untroubled and undisturbed in our enjoyment of it –
Peace and contentment to our hearts,
Peace upon our houses and our families,
Peace and blessing to our nation.
Amen

Spiritually rich and vital, Hours of Devotion evokes the mystery and power of prayer.

The shofar: a listener's guide

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

A hush falls over the congregation. The shofar is raised and the first blast – tekiah – is sounded. The shofar is one of Judaism's most famous symbols and is responsible for some of the religion's most profound writings. Today, some insights into the shofar from the far reaches of the web.

Rav Saadiah Gaon gives 10 reasons for blowing the shofar on Rosh Hashanah. Among them: "Rosh Hashanah is the day that commemorates the creation of the world and it is described as the 'coronation' of God. As it is customary to sound a trumpet at a king's coronation, so we blow the shofar on Rosh Hashanah. By blowing the shofar, we recognize the 'purpose' of the creation." [tinyurl. com/32oyox]

Every so often I come across a site that blows me away by its thoroughness, range and dedication to a topic. Arthur Finkle's Shofar Sounders Webpage is one of them. Finkle has sections you'd expect, such as Sounds of the Shofar, the Meanings of the Sounds, and Biblical and Mishnaic Citations. But did you ever consider Mouthpiece Importance or the Physics of a Shofar? And then there are his practical tips on how to blow a shofar: make sure your lips are moist. Don't forget to use your diaphragm. [tinyurl. com/2vplsb]

You may have perfected your blasts, but what do they all mean? My Jewish Learning has a great mini-site about the shofar including the page Jewish Morse Code: four shofar sounds, endless messages. "The cries of the shofar disturb the peace, calling upon us to open our sleepy eyes and see the untold thousands around us who are victims of human injustice. In the pensive, sad wail of the shvarim we can hear the moans of the world, the pain and suffering that surround us. In the staccato screams of the truah, we can hear the summons to do battle. 'Charge!' calls the shofar. 'Go out and do battle with injustice. Go out and make this world a better place.'" [tinyurl.com /yqvso8]

For the Jew, the urge to hear the shofar can be extremely powerful. Rabbi Eli Hecht tells the heartbreaking story of how a rabbi risked his life to sound a shofar in Auschwitz for hundreds of doomed children. [tinyurl. com/2hbmt5] And then there's the story of how some Conversos, Spanish Jews who officially converted to Christianity, were able to listen to the shofar on Rosh Hashanah without provoking the ire of the Inquisition. [tinyurl. com/4ukp9]

Sure you can buy a shofar at your local Judaica shop or through the web, but why not make one yourself? All you have to do is get your hands on the horn from a kosher animal: goat, ram, antelope, gazelle, bighorn sheep or ibex. (No cows please. Too much a connection to Exodus' golden calf and the sin of idol worship.) Then get an electric drill, soft wire, Borax and a coping saw. Presto! Your own homemade shofar. [tinyurl.com/3d6krh]

If you don't have an ibex handy but want to see what its shofar would look like, download Rabbi Natan Slifkin's Exotic Shofars. This 18-page booklet has shofars – some kosher, some not – from an incredible menagerie, including deer, gemsbok and eland. [tinyurl.com/2h3blx]

If you are lucky enough to have your own shofar, you may marvel at its beautiful craftsmanship and appreciate its evocative tones. But you may also come to the realization that it smells. How to clean a shofar? All it needs is some vinegar or baking soda and a good soaking. Just don't expect perfection. "Most shofars retain a slight, lingering reminiscence of their humble origin, the ram." [tinyurl.com/ 26k4mx]

For generations, shul-goers have been informally judging their shofar-blower's musical performance. Too soft! Too sharp! Too staccato! If those comments remind you of a reality TV talent show, then take a gander at Shofar Idol to see how three judges – including one sporting a black T-shirt – would review a High Holy Days routine. [danmeth.com/shofaridol. htm]

Undermining COR threatens the community

By RABBI MARVIN PACHINO

Guest Voice

One of the distinct advantages of Jewish life in Toronto is the existence of a single, competent, reliable and almost universally accepted kashrut supervision agency: the Kashruth Council of Canada, which is known by the acronym COR.

Anyone who has some familiarity with the confusing proliferation of individuals and organizations that offer kashrut certification today will know that COR ranks among the top few, worldwide, for its integrity and credibility. The Jewish community of Toronto is the stronger, and the better, for having established and maintained COR as our communal kashrut authority.

During the years that I served at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, we had no problem holding senior class banquets, and other school affairs, at Beth Tzedec Congregation, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue and Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, as well as at Beth Avaraham Yoseph and Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, because of the comfort level that COR provided for our diverse constituency. The same can be said for events in the broader community that are sponsored in synagogues or hotels by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Jewish National Fund, and any number of other organizations. And what about the countless number of family simchahs that take place in a variety of venues across the GTA?

In all of these cases, the kashrut supervision of COR has been the unifying force that has permitted Jews who identify with every diverse segment of our community to come together for private and communal events.

As well, the assurance which the COR stamp of approval provides is most welcomed by visitors to Toronto, who are spared the otherwise daunting task of investigating the varying standards of kashrut supervision that may apply to individual caterers and restaurants.

If multiple kashrut supervisions are allowed to take hold in Toronto, doubts will be raised as to which is reliable and which is not. People will be put into the uncomfortable position of having to make inquiries and investigate the qualifications of those who stand behind the respective supervisions. The average layman will be confused, and probably incapable of doing due diligence. Those for whom kashrut is really important will simply avoid participating in functions whose kashrut supervision they feel is questionable.

This is the reality in other communities where there is no central kashrut supervision agency, and where, in its stead, there are multiple hechsherim. It is true of New York and elsewhere, and it is especially evident in Jerusalem, where there has been a proliferation of private hechsherim over the last several years. The result is communal and familial bickering over which supervision is truly reliable, and the straining of social and family relationships.

Already, we are witness to this occuring in Toronto in the wake of a recently established private kashrut supervision body. The person who is behind this is, essentially, unknown in the community, and it would appear that he has no track record in the complex area of kashrut supervision, or the organization of a structure for kashrut supervision. He may have noble intentions, but that is really not enough in the contemporary field of kashrut supervision where up-to-date expertise in food chemistry and technology is an indispensible requirement, alongside a thorough knowledge of Halachah. Consequently, there are those who will not attend any function that is catered under this supervision, nor will they patronize any business establishment that bears its certificate of kashrut.

The seeds of dissension have been sown, and the community will, ultimately, suffer.

All of this having been said, we must acknowledge that COR is a human enterprise and, as such, one can imagine that there is always room for improvement, especially on the administrative and operational levels.

If, for example, the COR office has called a synagogue on a Thursday evening, as has been claimed, to say that it cannot provide a mashgiach for a Shabbat affair, this represents a serious administrative failure that should not have occurred, and that dare not be repeated. And if there are other legitimate complaints within the operational sphere of the agency, those who are affected have a right, maybe even an obligation, to express them and to have them addressed in a mutually satisfying manner.

However, none of this justifies the call to encourage multiple kashrut supervisions within the city. Quite to the contrary, such a call should be rejected for its potential to undermine not only the integrity of kashrut in our city, but the solidarity of our community.

Rabbi Marvin Pachino is the former headmaster of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Bar mitzvah boy sponsors dinner for homeless youth

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

When most kids think about their bar mitzvah, they hope their friends will have a good time at the party and they pray they won't make a mistake during their aliyah l'Torah.

But Zachary Baruch wanted to make sure that his bar mitzvah would be more meaningful to his family and the people in his community.

On Sept. 16, four days after his 13th birthday, and about a month before his bar mitzvah celebration, Baruch is hosting a dinner for 40 aboriginal youths at a homeless shelter in Toronto called Tumivut.

Zacharey Baruch

Zachary, a Grade 8 student at Upper Canada College (UCC) and a former Bialik Hebrew Day School student, came up with the idea with his father, Ron, who is on the board of directors of Ve'ahavta – the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, which assists the needy both locally and nationally.

"We came up with the idea of how can we parallel our festive celebration by helping others," Baruch said, adding that his son wanted to sponsor a dinner with the gifts he'll get from his bar mitzvah as it's scheduled so close to Thanksgiving.

"I inquired with the people at Ve'ahavta and it so happens that Tumivut, an aboriginal youth shelter, in the St. Clair [Avenue] and Bathurst [Street] area, were looking for funding for a dinner that they promised to the kids, about 40 youth, in the summer. They didn't have funding for it."

Zachary decided this was a good opportunity to help.

"When I heard that they were promised a steak dinner and a party, and they couldn't do it because they didn't have enough funds, I felt really bad. And because I'll be getting bar mitzvah money, I thought since I'm really fortunate, I should help them," he said.

Baruch and his father felt that since they were preparing for a night of dinner and dancing for his son's bar mitzvah, it would be nice to treat others to a similar kind of celebration.

"Before UCC, I went to Bialik and I learned about tikkun olam and [that] you should also give back to the community and people that are needy. I thought that this would be a really good opportunity and it helps them a lot. They're going to have the dinner they were promised, and they're also going to have a DJ," he said.

Baruch said his son and six or seven of his friends will help run the party. They will prepare loot bags for the teens, which will include toiletries, and there will be some fun giveaways.

"It isn't just a matter of funding but a matter of participating, and he and his friends are going to go that night on Sept. 16 and help out and serve and grill and participate," he added.

Zachary said that when he sent out e-mails to his friends to ask if anyone wanted to help, he got an enthusiastic response.

"One of my friends said he'd help right away, and he said that next year he wants to do something like that for high school, when you have to do community service."

This isn't the first time Zachary has participated in a project to help the needy.

"On a field trip last year, we went to a shelter, and we helped out by handing out food and clothes and it felt, when someone enjoyed it, it felt really good inside that you're helping someone less fortunate than you."

"I think it is important," his father said. "That's why I'm in Ve'ahavta. There are so many charities one can work for in Toronto, but what I like about Ve'ahavta is that they are hands-on. It is Jews helping not only ourselves, but all members of our community."

He added that he hopes that his son's sponsoring the dinner will encourage others to get involved.

"One of the important parts of this is that I want it to be contagious. I want people to know about it, and Zachary knows that. Hopefully, [his friends] will get the idea for their bar mitzvahs. For me, it is more about setting an example for others."

His daughter, Rebecca, has her bat mitzvah next May, and she, too, will be part of a project that will give back to the community.

"It is something we do as a family. Now, symbolically, he'll become a man, and hopefully it'll be something he'll take on into adulthood."

Temple Emanu-el marks 50th anniversary

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, now rabbi emeritus at Temple Emanu-el, was the congregation's founding spiritual leader.

Temple Emanu-El will kick off its 50th anniversary year over the High Holy Days with the distribution of a commemorative calendar to members and recognition of groups ranging from past leaders to children starting school for the first time.

"We're just planning on having everything sparkle a little more" over the holidays, said the temple's spiritual leader, Rabbi Debra Landsberg.

The coming year, which will culminate in a gala event next September, will include a speaker series, a family fest, a Yom Ha'atzmaut trip to Israel, and innovative educational programming spearheaded by Dan Mendelsohn Aviv, director of the temple's new Centre for Jewish Living and Learning.

His role in "transforming the educational program" at the synagogue is part of the anniversary year.

"We're using this as an opportunity to launch a new innovative vision of how we learn as Jews and how we live as Jews," the rabbi said.

"We do want to define ourselves as a centre for excellence and learning," she said, adding however, that the existing educational program has been a strong one.

"We're not trying to transform ourselves from educational weakness, but educational strength. That's an exciting way to embark upon change."

Mendelsohn Aviv, who has a PhD in Jewish education and taught most recently at Bialik Hebrew Day School, will be dealing with the entire age spectrum. He envisions adults learning together with children and plans to implement such a program on an experimental basis over the winter.

Congregation founded by small group of Reform Jews

Traditional Hebrew school is "not touching enough kids," said Rabbi Landsberg. Also, she added, "too many parents are disconnected."

The new program will be designed "for people who only have time to dip their toe in and those who are ready for radical, intensive engagement, and everything in between."

The rabbi describes the 360-family congregation as warm and open. A mother of 22-month-old triplets, she said the congregation "has enveloped my family with love."

The temple was founded by a small group of Reform Jews who initially met in the basement of a church on St. Clair Avenue. Services have been held in the current location on a 6.5-acre site on Old Colony Road since 1963, and in 1969-70, the congregation merged with Beth-El, a more traditional congregation.

Murray Koffler, a founding member, was attracted to the congregation by its "contemporary approach to Judaism," he said. "It suited our new, young family at that time."

Over the years, the congregation has incorporated more traditional aspects, he said. "I think it's for the better, because it's in keeping with what's happening.

Dan Mendelsohn Aviv

"I think it was one of the things I was most gratified I was part of from the very beginning," he said. "It's been a blessing to us."

Under the leadership of Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, now rabbi emeritus, from 1968 to 2001, the congregation became known for its involvement in social action initiatives, including the founding of Mazon Canada, Casey House and the Campaign against Child Poverty.

It also housed the Leo Baeck Day School before it had its own building.

The congregation "recognized the need for a Reform Jewish day school at a time when day schools were not particularly popular in the Reform community," Rabbi Bielfeld told The CJN.

Rabbi Debra Landsberg

The rabbi was ahead of his time in pioneering social service projects for youngsters celebrating their b'nai mitzvah. At the time, his initiative was "viewed with a certain amount of skepticism, and dare I say diffidence… I think it was viewed as a rather radical proposal," the rabbi recalls.

Rabbi Bielfeld also favoured interactive discussions rather than traditional sermons on Shabbat. "I found it was more productive and led to a greater sense of involvement in the service and in the ideas themselves," he said.

Since Rabbi Landsberg joined the congregation in 2001, she has strived to strengthen congregants' "love and connection with Torah and the Jewish world from here to Bathurst Street, to Israel and beyond," she said.

Lorne Krongold, president of the congregation and chair of its 50th anniversary year, said the sanctuary is intimate and designed like a theatre in the round, resulting in "an accessible congregation."

Dolores Wallis, who has been an active member of the congregation for more than 35 years, said that over the years, she has seen the introduction of more Hebrew and more singing into services.

Helene Rudolph, a past president and member since 1973, said that the temple "gave us that feeling of belonging" when she and her family were new to Toronto. "It's warm, very welcoming to new members."

She added that at morning minyan, even non-members "feel so supported." Minyans are held in a kiddush room overlooking the temple's biblical garden, which, Rudolph said, is "magnificent, and full of flowers in the summer."

The Centre for Jewish Studies at York University

Celebrates its Chai Anniversary - 18 years of Scholarship and Growth

MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR

Sara R.Horowitz, Director

It is customary, as the Yamim Nora'im, the High Holidays, approach, to wish one another a sweet year. The apples and honey that accompany our holiday meals symbolically emphasize this wish.

As we celebrate the Chai anniversary of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York, we are embarking on a new academic year that holds sweet promise. The year 5768 – the academic year 2007-2008 – marks the 18th year for our Centre, and also the first year of our new BA Program in Jewish Studies.

In the rabbinic tradition, the two days of Rosh Hashanah – celebrated as such even inside the borders of Israel – are considered to be one long day, yoma arikhta, in Aramaic. Although we eat two dinners, two lunches, attend two sets of services, and sleep for two nights, the two days are deemed a unit.

If, as a great Canadian thinker famously said, the medium is the message, what can we learn from this unique concept? Pragmatically, the days are separate, but conceptually, they are unified. This suggests the possibility of divisions that, paradoxically, unify, and of a whole that is greater than its parts.

Our new Jewish Studies BA Program, under the directorship of Professor Eric Lawee, will focus on undergraduate teaching. The Centre for Jewish studies will focus on research, graduate study, and public programming in Jewish Studies. Distinct but working harmoniously toward a shared educational mission, they may be considered Jewish Studies arikhta – extended – at York.

Together, our Centre and Program have a far-reaching mandate. York offers the largest university-level program in Jewish Studies in all of Canada, and one of the four largest outside of Israel. Outstanding scholars and dynamic teachers, our faculty members engage with students in ways that help define and deepen life commitments. We serve as advisors and consultants for projects and institutions important to the Jewish community at home and abroad. Through a wide range of activities on and off campus, the Centre promotes Jewish Studies for Jewish and non-Jewish students, and offers stimulating programs for the community. We teach about Judaism, Jewish texts, history, culture, languages and literatures.

Our unique Jewish Teacher Education Program promotes Jewish education across Canada, training future teachers, and offering professional development for Jewish school teachers and administrators. We are delighted that Professor Elliott Malamet has joined our faculty, directing our Jewish Teacher Education Program.

The Centre welcomes Barbara Bank as the new Chair of our Centre's Advisory Committee. Known for her inspriational leadership in national and international programs for the enhancement of Jewish life, Barbara has a particular interest in Jewish campus life.

The year 5768 – the academic year 2007-2008 – marks the 18th year for our Centre, and also the first year of our new BA Program

Our Centre owes our success to our faculty, our students, and to our many friends and supporters in the Jewish community.

I invite all of you to become involved in the activities at the Centre. Join us for lectures and cultural events, check out our courses, and help us to grow and develop further.

On behalf of my colleages at the Centre, I wish all of you a fruitful and sweet New Year. Shana Tova.

The Mark and Gail Appel Program in Holocaust and Antiracism Education - "Learning from the Past, Teaching for the Future"

– an initiative of the Centre for Jewish Studies and The Canadian Centre for German and European Studies at York University.

The project brings together Canadian university students and fellow students from Germany and Poland, to explore how best to counter racism – including anti-semitism – through teaching about the Holocaust. Thirty-one students participated in the field study this summer. The program also involves experts and members of the broader public in all three countries.

A follow-up symposium, including a public conference, will take place in February, 2008. The 2007-2008 cycle represents the fourth phase of the project, which began in 2001.

York professors Mark Webber and Michael Brown, co-founders of the program, are at the top of the railing, second and fourth from the left.

Annual Leonard Wolinsky Lecture on Jewish Life and Education - March 11, 2007

The theme of this year's Leonard Wolinsky Lecture was Jewish Issues in Medicine and Technology.

Right to Left: Professor Susan Kahn, Harvard University, who spoke on "Are Genes Jewish?" Professor Edward Reichman, Albert Einstein College of Medicine, Yeshiva University, New York, who spoke on "Jewish Medical Ethics in the Past, Present and Future: From Smallpox to Stem Cells." Professor Elliot Dorff, University of Judaism, Los Angeles, spoke on "Matters of Life and Death: A Jewish Approach to Modern Medical Ethics."

Special Announcement

Barbara Bank, community leader, well-known for her outstanding contributions to Jewish life locally, nationally, and internationally, has taken up the gavel as Chair of the Centre for Jewish Studies Advisory Committee.

Barbara has a special interest in Jewish campus life. She has spearheaded important projects to enrich and enhance the experience and education of students both in Canada and around the world. She has led many trips on the March of the Living and the March of Remembrance and Hope. She was honoured as the 2006 Person of Distinction by the Toronto Chapter of the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

We are delighted to have Barbara's experience and expertise guide us through the Centre's next period of growth.

In 1998, Julia Koschitzky, dedicated to the advancement of Jewish education, took on a leadership role at the Centre for Jewish Studies as the first chair of the Advisory Committee. Over the years, she inspired many others to become involved with the Centre. We thank her for her wisdom, guidance and grace during her fruitful term of office. She continues to serve on the York University Foundation Board of Directors, one of her many volunteer positions.

Twenty-eight students participated in the 3nd Annual Hebrew University-Osgoode Hall Law School Summer Exchange Program.

"...it was one of the most incredible experiences of my life. The program gave me a great opportunity to learn about my cultural background, as well as to familiarize myself with the current state of affairs in Israel." Rahmiel Rothenberg, Osgoode Hall Law School

The Jewish Education Report

From the desk of Epi

What's in a name?

Seymour Epstein, Sr. Vice-President, the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education

The Board of Jewish Education (BJE) has become a new, vibrant pillar of the Federation as a result of UJA Federation's Task Force on Jewish Day School Education. Aside from the new name – the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (המרכז לקידום חינוך יהודי in Hebrew, from which our nickname, The Mercaz, originates) – there are significant changes afoot, and they bode well for our Federation's ongoing commitment to Jewish education.

Both UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and its BJE have a wonderful record in the world of Jewish education for decades of service to the schools and hundreds of millions of dollars in day school tuition subsidy. Careful study, however, revealed certain areas of our operation which needed re-thinking and re-structuring.

We are now governed by a Federation committee, reflective of the various educational activities connected to the community - day schools, supplementary programs, youth work, camping, Israel experiences, and teacher education. Comprised of 12 members, the committee is responsible for the mission and policies of The Mercaz and for strategic educational planning in the community. Our "clients," as it were, are the Jewish families of Toronto and our concern is for every Jew to find a meaningful portal into the Jewish life of his or her choice. Traditionally, those gates were ones of study, and although the technique may now vary from books to YouTube to virtual/digital whatever, we are still convinced that the right mixture of identity and literacy sustains us as a people and leads to Jewish creativity, a much bolder goal than mere continuity.

Two of the key Task Force recommendations have become operational policy for The Mercaz. We must find ways to assist middle-income and less-affiliated families into the sphere of Jewish learning. New forms of financial assistance coupled with experimentation in new modes of schooling must combine to build capacity in the system.

And, two, capacity building also means quality enhancement. Through a rigorous program of Quality Review and Enhancement (QRE), all educational institutions which receive The Mercaz support will be asked to assess their own operations in the context of their specific ideology and pedagogy, and to determine with The Mercaz staff how to implement improvements in curriculum and instruction. These are but two of the changes in the new operation. Both the lay leadership and the professional staff of the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education are optimistic that these new challenges and our new name will lead to greater Jewish educational capacity, both in quantity and quality.

Educator awarded for excellence in Jewish education

By Jenna Adler

As a dedicated educator with a passion for teaching, Joy Reiter has earned accolades from those who have worked with her. Now her commitment and hard work have been recognized with the Grinspoon-Steinhardt Award for Excellence in Jewish Education, which was presented to her at a recent awards ceremony. The award recognizes educators who have a lasting impact on the lives of Jewish children.

Reiter is currently a principal at Kingsview Village Junior School within the Toronto District School Board (TDSB), Chair of Equity for Kingsview Village's affiliated schools and is also involved with promoting equity within the TDSB. Reiter, who has worked with the Downtown Jewish Community School for 22 years as a teacher, now acts as an educational consultant for the school.

Originally hailing from New York City where she began her teaching career, Reiter has worked at several Jewish schools, including Leo Baeck Day School, Netivot HaTorah, Bialik Hebrew Day School and Holy Blossom. "This award has validated all that I have tried to achieve, and I feel very honoured," she said.

Aside from having been officially acknowledged with the award, Reiter has also won praise from her colleagues.

"Joy is a first rate professional in every respect, an extraordinary teacher who uses multiple intelligences techniques, and is an excellent asset and mentor among the staff," said Joan Schoenfeld, Principal at the Downtown Jewish Community School.

Reiter is also a strong believer in promoting tolerance, and she has participated in professional development at the Simon Wiesenthal Center Museum of Tolerance in California. She feels her work in the public school system and Jewish school system are linked through the importance of promoting equity and in "building tolerance and acceptance of different cultures, races and religious beliefs." Reiter said she plans to continue working with the Simon Wiesenthal Center in promoting tolerance and hopes to attend the conference that it is sponsoring for educators in Israel next year.

Having dedicated 33 years of her life to the Jewish education system, Reiter believes Jewish education is essential because it is "an integral part of keeping the Jewish religion alive. Jewish education touches the souls of the children so they feel that Judaism is part of who they are and what they want in their lives."

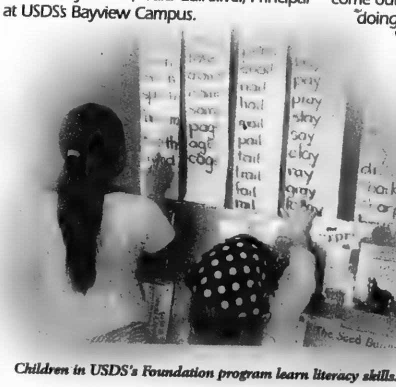
USDS alternative programs a success

by S.I. Stein

Three new alternative programs at United Synagogue Day School (USDS) have garnered success thanks to their ability to cater to children who require individual attention and are more suited to learning Jewish studies in English.

Launched a year ago, The USDS Foundation, Adaptive and Prep Stream programs have seen enrolment increase for the 2007 – 2008 school year.

"We're accommodating the difficulties that we've seen across the board in keeping children in day school," said Gail Silver, Principal at USDS's Bayview Campus.



Children in USDS's Foundation program learn literacy skills.

The USDS Foundation program is targeted towards primary grade children who require individual attention to develop their math and literacy skills. The teacher, a literacy and math specialist, will individualize the program based on the children's needs within a class of 10 children or less.

"The teacher identifies which way the child will learn best whether it's through a visual program, auditory program or a combination of programs and then the program is tailored for that child," said Silver. "Children come out and they're reading, printing and doing math."

What makes the Foundation program unique is that the children are integrated with their peer grade class for Hebrew language instruction, Shabbat, prayers, holidays and customs, according to Silver. "They participate in the full life of the school," she said.

The program was initiated in response to the recognition that there is an increasing number of children with learning difficulties in the early ages, according to Silver.

Children can remain in the Foundation program until grade 3, at which point they would move into USDS Adaptive program for children in grades 3 through 8.

In the Adaptive program Jewish studies are taught in English and Hebrew language instruction is maintained. The program is open to both children who are already enrolled at USDS as well as children new to the school who may not have a background in learning Jewish studies in Hebrew.

For middle school students with no previous education in Hebrew or Jewish studies, USDS created a Prep Stream program. Geared to children in grades 6, 7 and 8, the Prep Stream program has mostly attracted families looking to send their children to TanenbaumCHAT, according to Silver.

The greatest benefit of these new programs is that they enable children who might otherwise struggle within a day school environment to remain within the system.

"Our mandate is to keep Jewish kids in Jewish day school," said Rosemary Tile, USDS Admissions Coordinator. "That's what we're all about - Jewish education and - first and foremost - keeping kids in Jewish day school."

New forum provides networking opportunity for teachers

by S.I. Stein

A new forum will provide both new and experienced teachers with an opportunity to network and share information in an open environment.

While UJA Federation's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (The Mercaz) has always offered workshops, this is the first time a comprehensive forum that meets on a regular basis is being offered to teachers.

"Teaching is a very reflective practice, so this will give teachers the opportunity and the space to develop a professional learning community," said Ora Shulman, supervisor of The Mercaz Teacher Centre and an early years consultant with The Mercaz.

The Teachers Forum was initiated after Shulman received feedback from teachers who said they wanted the opportunity to network with other educators, exchange ideas and explore available resources.

Shulman also sensed there was a need for an ongoing teachers' forum based on the workshops she has conducted. "From feeling the pulse of the teachers who came in to the workshops, I knew there was a need to create this," she said.

Two elements are central to the forum: introducing teachers to innovations and new techniques and providing them with a support network so they can reflect on those techniques after they've tried them out in the classroom.

"Teachers can benefit from hearing other teachers when it's not just two minutes in the hall," said Shulman. "This is a more relaxed environment – it's non-judgmental and very confidential."

Janine Pokroy, a nursery teacher at Leo Baeck Day School, said she signed up for the Teachers Forum to gather new information, share ideas and meet new people in the field.

"I believe all the information I can get will be very beneficial to the children I teach," she said. "I'm willing to try anything that will benefit the kids and broaden my own resources and knowledge."

Shulman hopes teachers participating in the forum will acquire the tools to critically assess the way they teach and allow their students to demonstrate their learning in a variety of different ways.

"I believe that every teacher wants to succeed and every child wants to succeed in their learning," said Shulman.

Beginning on September 18, the Teachers Forum will meet on the third Tuesday of every month until May. The forum aims to have 15 to 20 teachers participating on a regular basis.

A new Teachers Forum will give educators an opportunity to network and learn about new techniques.

New Beth Tzedec initiative integrates children with special needs

A new initiative at Beth Tzedec congregational school will provide support to children with special needs while integrating them within a regular classroom setting.

Launched this month, the "Gesher" initiative offers children with special needs with a "shadow" in the classroom who will work one-on-one with each student, giving them individual attention. Special education support materials are also being purchased.

"We had some students who were struggling and we wanted to help them," said Elly Bauman, Director of the Institute for Jewish Family Living at Beth Tzedec. "And then we had a family that gave us a very nice gift in order to help children with special needs access education."

Children at Beth Tzedec take part in a sing-a-long. Beth Tzedec's new Gesher initiative keeps children with special needs integrated within the classroom.

Keeping children with special needs integrated within the classroom is a major feature of the initiative.

"I think they get much more out of being in a classroom environment, meeting other children and being involved in the whole school experience than they would with just one-on-one tutoring in their house," said Bauman.

UJA Federation's Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education (The Mercaz) fully supports the "Gesher" initiative and will be offering Beth Tzedec consulting support services, according to Chari Schwartz, The Mercaz coordinator of supplementary programs. "The 'Gesher' initiative falls in line with our mission statement that all children, regardless of exceptionality, can achieve their greatest potential," said Schwartz.

This is the first time Beth Tzedec has developed a defined program to assist children with special needs.

"In the past if we needed to hire a 'shadow' we have, but now it's a true initiative that we know we have the funds to hire 'shadows' and [buy] materials," said Bauman, adding that a shadow is someone who is qualified in special education and will work one-on-one with the student. In the past, children who required additional help were taken out of the classroom to work with a reading specialist. "This initiative will enable the kids to stay in the classroom for longer periods of time with somebody helping them," said Bauman. "I think it's important for all children to have access to Jewish education – I feel that any child deserves to have the avenues open to them to be able to learn Hebrew and to learn about their history and their Judaism."

Beth Tzedec congregational school operates every Sunday morning and Wednesday afternoon. The "Gesher" program, which accommodates children in grades 1 to 7, is open to both members and non-members. Registration is still available.

Israel plans to double tourism by 2012

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Israel's tourism industry has endured something of a roller-coaster ride in recent years, plunging from a best-ever year in 2000 to several years of sub-par performance, thanks largely to the Palestinian intifadah and 9/11.

The industry has rebounded considerably and now, Israel's Tourism Ministry is setting its sights on setting new records.

Something like 2.5 million visitors flocked to Israel in 2000 – a record year – but the ministry believes that figure can be doubled by 2012, said Oded Grofman, the newly installed head of the Israel Government Tourism Office (IGTO) in Toronto. The number of Canadians visiting Israel can also be doubled, from around 60,000 to about 100,000, he suggested.

Grofman, who has been on the job only a couple of weeks, said the Israeli government "wants to reach five million [visitors overall]. In order to do it, you need a strategy and a budget."

The ministry commissioned Ernst and Young to study the travel industry, and the professional services corporation found eight priority markets for Israel to tap. The ministry has decided to focus on one for now, Canada and the United States, Grofman said.

Some $12 million (US) of a projected $50 million budget has been set aside for advertising and other marketing tools in North America.

As Grofman described it, the plan will see the ministry focus on Israel's cultural history, push for an Open Skies policy that reduces restrictions on airlines and will promote investment in new hotels and attractions.

The print ad campaign has already begun, Grofman, 35, said, while the IGTO's website features a new section on "best deals" to Israel.

Oded Grofman

Grofman, a native of Tel Aviv who served as a paratrooper in the army, joined the Israeli tourism ministry after eight years as a sales manager in the private sector. "I saw the opportunity to market and sell Israel," he said. "We have one of the best products in the world."

The IGTO's target market in Canada is threefold, he said. First there is the Jewish market, then there are Christian groups and finally there is the "sophisticated traveller" with no particular emotional attachment to Israel but with an interest in cultural attractions, fine hotels, good weather and in making their currency go far.

Jerry Adler, manager of marketing and public relations for the IGTO, said "there's a great curiosity" about Israel among non-Jewish travellers, who are familiar with the bible and current history. Many will package a trip to the Jewish state with visits to neigbouring Egypt and Jordan.

Grofman, who served for a short time as adviser to Tourism Minister Yitzhak Aharonovitch, said there is plenty of room to grow the Jewish market. Only about 10 per cent of Canadian Jews have ever been to Israel.

First time visitors often opt for the "classical tour" that includes Jerusalem, Masada, the Dead Sea and Tel Aviv, while repeat visitors are offered "niche tours" that may involve yacht rentals or winery visits in the vicinity of Jerusalem.

The Christian market remains a focus of the IGTO and as many as 4,000 Christian groups from around the world – 20 per cent more than in 2005 – are expected in Israel this October and November.

While the fall and winter have proven to be most popular with Christian groups, the peak tourist season remains the summer along with April (Passover), with hotels in Tel Aviv, Netanya and Jerusalem fully booked this past July. In fact, the 6,500 visitors to Israel that month marked a 36 per cent increase over July 2006 while overall in 2007, Canadian visits to Israel are expected to jump to 67,500, a 25 per cent increase over 2005, another good year.

Adler said a major marketing campaign is expected to highlight visits to Israel in 2008, the 60th anniversary of the country's independence, with a full year of activities and attractions planned.

Canada's stand welcomed

Last summer, Canada lined up squarely behind Israel in its conflict with Hezbollah, with Prime Minister Stephen Harper saying Canada would not be even-handed in a conflict between a fellow democracy and the terrorist organization.

Baker welcomed that position, saying "you can't take a middle position between terrorism and a democratic state. You have to stand strongly against terrorism, or you'll find terrorism at your back door."

Baker acknowledged Canada's international role, saying "the relationship has continued to be very strong and very supportive. The Canadian government under Mr. Harper has maintained the staunch stand of supporting Israel, of intervening in international events to prevent them from becoming Israel-bashing events."

Baker noted that during then-foreign affairs minister Peter McKay's visit to Israel, he met with the parents of three captured Israeli soldiers.

And Israeli Foreign Affairs Minister Tzipi Livni, during her visit to Canada, "gave a strong push to the Canada Israel Chamber of Commerce," which is working to expand trade between the two countries.

Baker acknowledged Canada's influence in international fora, such as the United Nations and its agencies, and he urged Canada "to take an active role to prevent ganging up on Israel and the turning of these organizations into useless organizations."

Three key items remain on Israel's agenda when it comes to relations with Canada, he said.

The first is soliciting Canada's help in freeing the three captured Israeli soldiers, or at least getting more information about them.

The second is maintaining "an uncompromising and strong position about Hamas and Hezbollah and not be drawn into a false position about opening dialogue that would moderate them."

And finally, the third is addressing the threat posed by Iran not just to Israel and its Middle East neighbours, but to the wider international community, Baker said.

Looking to the year ahead, Baker said he would continue to speak out on campuses to Jewish groups and the wider student body, attempting to correct the distorted picture of Israel being reported in the Canadian news media.

He also urged the Jewish community "to devote as many resources as they can to help Jewish students on campus." They are subject to a well-organized campaign by Muslim students and other who are attempting to delegitimize Israel. "It's where minds are moulded, and it's the future of the Jewish community as well," he said.

And in keeping with the tenor of the season, he called on the Jewish community "to pray very sincerely for the lives of the Israelis… being held captive. These are our kids and we should pray for them, hope for them that they are safe and alive and come home during the course of this year.'"

Blue dogtag project underway

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A blue dogtag on a long metal chain now available in Toronto bears the names of kidnapped Israeli soldiers Ehud Goldwasser, Eldad Regev and Gilad Shalit.

A new project of the Toronto Zionist Council, the dogtag is intended to remind people of the plight of these men, who were kidnapped by Palestinian militants last year, and to help the citizens of Sderot, who are under almost daily rocket attacks from the Gaza strip.

The tags are sold at the two Israel's Judaica stores for a minimum donation of $18. The funds raised will help provide for the unemployed, and for shelters, trauma victims and general social assistance in Sderot.

Shalit was kidnapped by Hamas militants June 25, 2006. His captors recently released a tape purportedly from him, asking Israel to release various Palestinian prisoners, and saying he needed medical help.

Goldwasser and Regev were captured July 12, 2006, by Hezbollah. It is not known whether they are still alive.

Izzie Kaplan, vice-president of the Toronto Zionist Council and owner of Israel's Judaica Centre, is funding the new project.

He said he got the idea when UJA Federation of Greater Toronto started its campaign of lawn signs just after the Second Lebanon War. "The signs said, 'We don't leave our sons behind.' We got the message that the typical position of the IDF was to bring Israeli soldiers home – dead or alive."

But when the war ended, Kaplan said, media reports showed that Prime Minister Ehud Olmert had given up on bringing them home, because it would cost too many lives.

"Those federation signs were a lie. We did leave them behind," Kaplan said bitterly.

He said that he and the council decided to remember the soldiers and use Sderot to send the message to "keep those boys in our hearts – to pray for them, and to feel the pain of their parents."

Pidyon shvuyim, redeeming the captives, is an important mitzvah, Kaplan said, one that is very easy to forget.

Sderot, a city in the northwest part of the Negev desert, 20 kilometres from Ashkelon, is attacked daily. Kaplan said that "the Israeli government never tolerated cities being bombed daily – Israel has gone to war over that. Now Sderot citizens have been left out to dry."

The bombing has had a devastating effect on the city. According to media reports, the economy has suffered and many of the buildings have been destroyed. Unemployment is high, and many of the residents are seriously traumatized.

The publicity generated by the sale of the tags might serve as an impetus for the captives to be freed, Kaplan mused, as well as reminding people here about what is happening in Sderot.

PR practitioner honoured for community work

'I hope I can continue to encourage others to be involved' — Monty Mazin

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

To add to his other awards for outstanding service to the community, 80-year-old Monty Mazin recently received the Shield of Public Service Award from the Canadian Public Relations Society (CPRS).

An organization of people who practice public relations in Canada and abroad, CPRS has more than 1,600 members who work to maintain high standards and share a uniquely Canadian experience in public relations. Mazin has been a member for more than 35 years.

The retired, ebullient public relations advisor is also a fundraising guru whose energy level belies his age. He has a talent for reaching out to others and motivating them to join his quest for communal service.

"I was overwhelmed to know that I was selected for the award and that the Shield of Public Service was last presented to a member in Ontario 20 years ago," Mazin said in an interview.

Karen Dalton, executive director of the Canadian Public Relations Society, presents the society's Shield of Public Service Award to Monty Mazin.

At the award presentation, Karen Dalton, national executive director of CPRS, said the award is presented to an accredited member of the society "for distinguished and dedicated service in the public interest."

She added that the award is presented to a member who has made a personal effort on behalf of public service entirely apart from the work done for clients.

And Mazin has indeed done a great deal for the community. He is the first vice-president of the resident's council and co-chair of the program committee of the Reuben Cipin Health Living Community, where he lives with his wife, Bleema. In 1999, he received the Governor General's Caring Canadian Award from Adrienne Clarkson, then the governor general of Canada.

He was has been active with Rotary International, which twice presented him with the Paul Harris Fellowship, and he received a lifetime achievement award for his community work from the Rotary Club of Toronto Don Valley.

Mazin describes himself as "a true Cockney." He was born in London, England. When he was three years old, he was struck with polio and walked with crutches until he was nine.

At that time, without the proper facilities for children labelled "cripple," he was sent to a school for the developmentally challenged. This made it difficult for him to have a proper education, he said.

During World War II, when Mazin was 12, his mother died of cancer, and he and his sister went to live in a Brighton evacuees facility.

He attended evening classes at South Devon College where his teachers recognized his writing skills, and he then took a job as a reporter at the East London Observer.

In 1956, Mazin moved to Montreal with his first wife and their son, Stephen. When he was told by his doctor that he should not be physically active or travelling so much in his job as a journalist, he began his career as a public relations advisor.

Over the years, he worked for Israel Bonds in Calgary, the Jewish National Fund (JNF), Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto, B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews.

His community service includes raising thousands of dollars for the Salvation Army at Christmas for many years, assisting children with physical disabilities, serving four times as mayor and chair of the B'nai Brith Jerusalem Pavilion during the Metro International Caravan, serving as chair of GEMS (Global Ed-Med Supplies) of Hope, an organization that helps people in need in the developing world. He still finds time to assist at bingo games for seniors.

"Many accomplishments would not have been possible without the encouragement and support of my wife Bleema," Mazin said.

He noted that the gap between those who have and those who do not have is growing. "And with government cutbacks, the need for volunteer public service is greater than ever. I hope I can continue to encourage others to be involved."

Family seeks to recover looted painting from Liz Taylor

Appeals to U.S. Supreme Court

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Members of a family who claim that actress Elizabeth Taylor has their great-grandmother's van Gogh painting are taking their case to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Hamilton lawyer Andrew Orkin and his cousins Mark Orkin and Sarah-Rose Adler of South Africa state in their petition last month that the late Margarete Mauthner was forced to give up the oil painting – 1889's Vue de l'Asile et de la Chapelle de Saint-Remy (View of the Asylum and Chapel at Saint-Remy) – because of Nazi economic and political coercion before she fled Berlin for South Africa in 1939.

The family seeks to overturn rulings of the Ninth Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals and the California District Court, which found that the the statute of limitations for the family to file a claim had expired.

But the heirs claim the painting is subject to the 1998 Holocaust Victims Redress Act, a U.S. law that regards artwork sold or forfeited as a result of the policies of Nazi Germany as having been wrongfully confiscated by Nazi authorities and requires such works to be returned to their original owners or heirs.

"We are asking the Supreme Court to consider… that when Taylor and her art dealer father bought the painting in 1963, they disregarded strong evidence that our great-grandmother lost the painting in Berlin in the late 1930s as a result of Nazi coercion," Andrew Orkin said in a statement.

The Supreme Court is expected to rule in fall whether it will hear the case.

A brochure published for Taylor by Christie's auction house when she tried to sell the van Gogh in 1990 acknowledges that Mauthner was "among the first and most important collectors and patrons of van Gogh's work in Germany." It also referenced the catalogues raisonnées by renowned van Gogh expert J.B. de la Faille.

A catalogue raisonné is a complete documentation, compiled by a recognized scholar, of an artist's production. These are widely accepted in art circles as the definitive history of a piece of art.

But, the petitioners argue, Taylor's 1990 brochure did not disclose that the painting was registered in the two latest (1939 and 1970) catalogues raisonnées as having been owned in Berlin by Mauthner in 1937 or later. Instead, the brochure only said that Mauthner "kept the picture until at least 1928."

They also argue that Taylor's brochure asserted, contrary to the provenance in the two de la Faille catalogues raisonnées, that two dealers had owned the van Gogh between Mauthner and collector Alfred Wolf, from whom Taylor bought the painting in London in 1963.

Ruling showcases Israel's legal freedoms

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Last week, considerable media attention was focused on an Israeli Supreme Court ruling that the military must reroute part of its security barrier near the West Bank village of Bilin.

The barrier separates Bilin farmers from large parts of their land. With the help of Israeli lawyers and activists, the Bilin villagers petitioned Israel's highest court to hear their case. A three-judge panel ruled unanimously in the Palestinians' favour, ordering the Israeli government to move a mile-long section of the barrier in a "reasonable period of time."

In "Israeli Court Orders Barrier Rerouted" (New York Times, Sept. 5), Isabel Kershner reported: "Chief Justice Dorit Beinish wrote in the ruling, 'We were not convinced that it is necessary for security-military reasons to retain the current route that passes on Bilin's lands.'"

Kershner added: "The Defence Ministry, which oversees the planning and construction of the barrier, said it would 'study the ruling and respect it.'"

About 10 per cent of West Bank land is affected by the security barrier. While there have been a few other cases in which the Supreme Court has ordered the barrier moved, generally, the court has ruled in the government's favour, determining that security requirements must prevail despite regrettable hardships in certain areas to Palestinians.

The court's effort to achieve a balance between Israel's security needs and preventing undue hardship to Palestinians is termed "proportionality."

In "Israeli court hands down order to reroute West bank barrier," (Globe and Mail, Sept. 5), Carolynne Wheeler carefully covered both sides of this complex subject. She noted that Bilin has been the scene of protests and clashes with the Israel Defence Forces for more than two years.

Wheeler quoted Bilin resident, Abdallah Abu Rahmed: "We're ecstatic about the court's decision… It is a step in the right direction."

Wheeler also quoted Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev: "Obviously, the executive branch will fully implement the decision of the Supreme Court. I think in Israel we're all proud we live in a country where there are checks and balances, where there is an independent and powerful judiciary."

Wheeler added that, according to Regev, "the barrier remains a 'legitimate means' of protecting Israelis from suicide bombers."

Israel's legal system was also the subject of a Washington Post editorial last week ("Israel's example," Sept. 4) on the controversial issue of whether to extend due process to terror suspects from other countries. Israel does. The United States does not, but this is being challenged in its Supreme Court.

The Post wrote: "No one would say that Israel is soft on terrorism, which makes it all the more fascinating that a country that essentially lives under siege provides so many legal accommodations to those it detains as unlawful combatants."

As is well known, non-U.S. citizens who are deemed terror suspects and incarcerated at Guantanamo Bay currently have no right to the constitutional protections afforded Americans.

Far less known is the fact that in Israel, as the Post notes, "even non-citizens captured outside the country and designated unlawful combatants are entitled to due process in Israeli civilian courts. They are guaranteed judicial review of their detention within 14 days of capture. They are guaranteed the services of a lawyer no later than 34 days after capture. And they are guaranteed a review of their detention by an Israeli district court judge every six months thereafter."

It's little wonder the Post wrote that Israel's approach is "a stark contrast to the Bush administration's approach and one the [U.S.] administration may be able to learn from."

Anti-Semitic graffiti found in Bowmanville

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Bowmanville home was trashed and defaced with anti-Semitic grafitti, including swastikas, in an incident that police are not treating as a hate crime.

Durham Regional Police are continuing to investigate the incident and are treating it as a property mischief case, said Sgt. Paul McCurbin, media relations officer for Durham police. "Although the swastika is there to insult, under the Criminal Code it doesn't fall as a hate crime," he said.

The incident was discovered last week when the owners of the Bowmanville rental property, accompanied by a sheriff, arrived to evict a longstanding tenant for not paying the rent.

Marion Schwarz and her son Alan were stunned to find the two-storey home in central Bowmanville, east of Toronto, gutted and covered with anti-Semitic epithets. They were greeted with swastikas painted on the front door and on the inside, along with, "F--k Jews," "Kike," "white power," and "SS." In addition, the ceiling and walls were destroyed.

"It looks like a baseball bat and a hatchet were used," Alan said.

"We walked in and it hits you in the stomach.

"We lost a lot of people" in the Holocaust, said Schwarz, whose father, Joe, fled Germany in 1938 to escape the Nazis.

"We never expected to have this. The weird part of it all is that we tried to accommodate these people."

Schwarz said his mother, who received the property as a gift from his father on their 40th wedding anniversary, dropped the rent $100 a month when the tenants had trouble paying. Nevertheless, rent cheques began bouncing and they hadn't been paid since May.

Schwarz disagrees with police that the incident is not a hate crime. "I think it was a targeted thing. I think it was a hate crime, putting up symbols to intimidate people."

As of The CJN's press time, no arrests had been made and police would not say if they were treating the tenants as the primary suspects.

Chassidim considering shift to Tories in Outremont

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The large chassidic community in the riding of Outremont, which tends to vote as a bloc, appears to be split on whom to cast its ballots for in the Sept. 17 byelection.

Like other voters in this safe riding, the chassidim have historically been strong Liberal supporters, but a significant number of them are looking seriously at the Conservatives this time around, according to one community spokesperson, Meyer Feig, president of the Jewish Orthodox Community Council.

"There's definitely talk of the Conservatives. People like their defence of traditional values, they seem more family-oriented, and we are very happy with the way [Prime Minister Stephen] Harper has treated the Israel portfolio. There's a feeling the Conservative government means what it says," he said.

A lot of chassidim, who are affiliated with a half-dozen different communities, were disillusioned with the Liberals over the legalization of same-sex marriage, Feig said. Nevertheless, the great majority voted Liberal in the last federal election in January 2006.

A more seasoned political observer, Alex Werzberger, head of the Coalition of Chassidic Organizations of Outremont, thinks that when they reach the voting booth, most chassidim will remain Liberal.

The reason is mainly pragmatic: the riding is almost certain to remain Liberal, despite a spirited challenge by the NDP's Thomas Mulcair, and it's wise to back a winner. "Basically, things haven't changed. The bulk will go to the Liberals. I don't see a major shift to the Conservatives," Werzberger said.

The Conservatives came fourth in Outremont, which was held by former cabinet minister Jean Lapierre, in the last general election in January 2006. The Bloc Québécois was second and the NDP third.

Feig said he and many other chassidim are not keen on the views of the current Liberal candidate, professor and journalist Jocelyn Coulon, whose past positions on Israel and the Middle East have caused concern in the mainstream Jewish community as well.

B'nai Brith Canada, in fact, called on Liberal leader Stéphane Dion, who personally chose Coulon because of his international affairs expertise, to withdraw his candidacy when it was announced in July.

Coulon, who has written extensively over the years on the Middle East in French-language newspapers and for academic publications, reversed his position that Hamas should not be shunned by Israel and the West, while speaking to Jewish community leaders last month, because Hamas, which has been designated as a terror group in Canada, has not renounced violence.

The Outremont chassidim are, in varying degrees, theologically anti-Zionist, but that does not mean they do not care deeply for Jews living in the land of Israel, Werzberger said.

About 10 per cent of Outremont riding's 66,000 voters are Jewish, and about a third of those are chassidim. Their generally high turnout during elections and voting solidarity has given them political clout beyond their numbers.

‘Genocide cannot properly be subject to a statute of limitations’

Mauthner died in 1947 at the age of 84. As a young lady in Berlin, she had been part of an association of progressive artists. She was instrumental in introducing van Gogh to Germany, as she translated his letters to German in 1907.

Reported cases in many countries tell of Jewish citizens who were forced to sell artwork for food or to obtain passports, or under policies directing Jews to deposit artworks at municipal pawnshops.

The U.S. government long ago warned U.S. art dealers, museums and other purchasers of artworks that were in Germany during those years to be aware of the possibility of questionable provenance and the original owners’ right to restitution.

“Genocide cannot properly be subject to a statute of limitations and there must be an enduring right to Holocaust redress, especially in the compelling context of a case like this,” Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz, co-counsel to the family, said in a press release.

The U.S. House of Representatives passed the Holocaust Victims Redress Act in 1998 to assist in the restitution of assets looted or extorted from Holocaust victims.

At the time, Rep. James Leach said, “While little is more difficult than to judge the past, to establish what in this case must be called retrospective justice, it must be understood that history does not have a statute of limitations. People cannot be allowed to disappear from earth without tracks, without moral if not monetary restitution.”

Richard Altman, one the the family’s lawyer’s, says it’s “intolerable” that various U.S. Circuit Courts approach Holocaust-era claims differently.

“It is unjust that in California, a Holocaust claim can be too late, while in New York the same claim could be heard,” Altman said in a statement. “We hope that the Supreme Court will accept this case and establish a uniform nationwide rule, one that allows Holocaust survivors and their heirs to have their day in court at last, no matter where they happen to live, or wherever their property may be found.”

Canadians train for Israeli cycling fundraiser

Wheels of Love hopes to raise $3 million in support of children's rehab hospital

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Three Ottawa men, along with some 60 men and women from the Toronto area, are training for a five-day bicycle ride in Israel known as Wheels of Love.

The ride is in support of Alyn Hospital, Israel's premiere comprehensive rehabilitation centre for physically challenged and disabled children. Since its inception in 2000 when nine Israelis rode for five days and raised $65,000 for the hospital, it has grown to attract approximately 500 participants from around the world this year and the fundraising goal is $3 million. Wheels of Love is not only the largest annual fundraiser for Alyn Hospital, but it's now Israel's single largest athletic fundraising event.

Joel Diener, co-owner of Saslove's Meat Markets, is one of three people from Ottawa, along with Roger Greenberg and Ian Bodnoff, who will be taking part this year.

Diener has been training since May, when he decided to sign up, but prior to that, he had not been doing any serious cycling.

"I started from nothing and now am doing 70 kilometres with relative ease," he said.

"I think it is going to be an exciting experience. We have pledged to each other that if we survive we will come back and spread the word in Ottawa. Hopefully, next year there will be a much larger contingent from Ottawa."

David Gershuni, a retired actuary from Toronto (formerly of Montreal) will be returning for his fifth Wheels of Love.

"It incorporates three of the things that are dear to my heart: bicycle riding, being in Israel and riding in Israel," he said.

"The work that those people do, at the hospital, is, at the end of the day what drives me to go back… I have children and grandchildren and I am blessed that they all function… it is so good that there is such a hospital in Israel, for children that in many cases would be written off. It really tugs at the heartstrings."

Jerry Solomon, executive director of Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot Girls' School

Jerry Solomon, executive director of Yeshivat Or Chaim-Ulpanat Orot Girls' School in Toronto, has been cycling for a number of years and has participated in several other charity bike rides. He frequently travels to Israel, where two of his three children now live, but he has never seen the country by bike.

Although he cycles regularly, Solomon has stepped up his training for the Wheels of Love event.

"I am doing special training now, going out into the country to practise hills, because it is a hilly ride. I have been training specifically for this ride for three months now, and I also jog, so I have been increasing my jogging distance and will be doing a half-marathon at the end of September."

"One of the things that appeals to me about this ride is that it brings together a group of people from around the world and also all kinds of Jews, across the spectrum, working together for one purpose. It doesn't matter if they are religious or secular or where they come from, everyone will be enjoying themselves while working for a good and worthwhile cause," Solomon said.

In addition to its physical demands, Wheels of Love also presents a fundraising challenge. The riders not only pay their own airfares to and from Israel and take at least a week off work, but each pledges to raise a minimum of $2,000 for the hospital.

The ride begins on Oct. 28 in Tiberias and ends five days – and almost 300 miles – later in Jerusalem.

U of T student does it all

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Alex Goodman

It seems that there aren't many challenges 19-year-old Alex Goodman is afraid to face.

An accomplished musician, academic, world traveller and public sector worker, Goodman has done and seen more than some do in a lifetime.

Goodman, a student at the University of Toronto, made the switch this year from McGill University where he spent two years pursuing two degrees concurrently – a bachelor's in music in jazz performance, and a bachelor's in political science, minoring in Spanish and French.

After deciding he would take a semester off last year to take advantage of work and musical opportunities, the Toronto native applied to U of T and was offered a full scholarship – the prestigious Phil Nimmons scholarship through which he could continue pursuing his two degrees.

As if managing two degrees isn't overwhelming enough, Goodman is an active member of the Toronto jazz scene, and also spends his spare time working for not-for-profit organizations.

"It's a little bit intense but I really enjoy the things I'm doing. Even though it is a very heavy workload and it requires organization to get through it, I'm really happy doing all these things and it'll be nice to have the opportunity to pursue different career paths," he said.

Last year, Goodman was approached by Canadian Centres for Teaching Peace, a non-profit organization that holds annual conferences about peace education, who asked him if he would start a centre based in Quebec. He founded the bilingual PaixQuebecPeace organization, which runs annual peace education conferences and local social justice outreach programs.

He even found a way to combine his interest in this kind of work with his academic pursuits.

Last year he wrote an undergraduate thesis titled Canadian Policy Oriented Peace Research Organizations, which focused on the think-tank community in Canada and the work that has been done in peace building and foreign affairs.

Goodman spent this summer working with a think-tank in Toronto called the Dominion Institute, which has a mission to "build active and informed citizens through greater knowledge and appreciation of the Canadian story."

The Dominion Institute is responsible for putting out the Annual Canada Day Survey and organizing state funerals for Canadian war veterans.

But despite how devoted he is to public sector work, music seems to be his true passion, although this wasn't always the case.

ואז מציין המדען שפיתח את התגלית שבישראל עצמה, אחת המדינות הכי עניות בעולם באנרגיה, לא התחילו עוד להתלהב מן התגלית שלו.....ואחרי מאמצי שכנוע רבים יקימו עכשיו תא אנרגיה ראשון.

נַחֲשו איפה ממוקמת החברה לייצור תחנות כוח באנרגיית שמש! כמובן-בבית שמש...... אבל שיישאר בינינו.

האוהדים של הפועל תל אביב

העובדות קצרות וברורות:

מאיפה הגיעו ישראלים יהודים ילידי הארץ, אפילו אם הם מהמעמד הבזוי של חוליגני כדורגל, לכזאת רמה של אַרְוֹנְנטיות ויהירות!

מאיפה יש להם את השילוב הקטלני הזה של שחצנות ומוגבלות להביא כל כך הרבה נזק! אבל שישאר בינינו.

אל על

ואם מדברים על אַרְוֹנְנטיות ישראלית-עוד שיא נשבר בימים אלה:

ברמה יותר רצינית-אם מנכ"ל אל-על באמת חושב שהוא הגיע לרמתה של לופט האנזה-ברור שהוא מעולם לא יגיע לשם. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Played piano at age 9

He said he started playing the piano when he was nine years old. In just three years, Goodman came within two marks of passing his Grade 8 Royal Conservatory exam. Despite the fact that it came so naturally to him, he decided it wasn't for him.

"I just didn't want to do it anymore. I gave up and I didn't really think about music," he said.

"I picked up guitar when I was in high school because I thought it was the cool thing to do. I was probably about 14 when I started and I was over at UTS [The University of Toronto Schools – a school that offers specialized curriculum for high achieving students].

"I started studying classical guitar because I liked the sense of challenge and I liked the idea of being able to grade [my progress] and that there was structure to what I was learning. I figured I'd approach it like that so no matter what I was doing I'd have a solid foundation," Goodman said.

In the summer after Grade 11, he went to the Interprovincial Music Camp at Camp Manitou, where he learned with a "very high caliber faculty," and started to think about making the switch to jazz guitar.

"In the next year, I started to study with jazz guitarist Rob Campbell, and it really just took off from there," he said.

He decided to take a year off between high school and university in 2005, he said, so he could pursue other opportunities including a job with Citizenship and Immigration Canada, and playing gigs in Toronto-area restaurants and at corporate events with other musicians his age.

Before he knew it, Goodman was taking his musical talents half-way across the world. With his parents, Goodman travelled to Hong Kong, Thailand and India.

"I actually organized some performance opportunities beforehand so I was able to play in hotels in Thailand, and in India I recorded with a fantastic Indian jazz guitarist. Then I went backpacking in the southwest of India. It was amazing."

He said that as of last year, he began to play with a renowned violinist in Toronto named Ed Vokurka, who he considers a mentor.

"I met him at a jam and he gave me his card and I gave him my card and for two or three months, just to get my foot in the door, and be able to play with him, I played with him for free... After some time, he let me join his group and since then I've been a member [of] the Ed Vokurka Swing and Jazz Violin Ensemble."

He said that now, he feels like working in the music industry is something he'd like to pursue.

"It's been going very well lately, and the thing is, some paths have opened up for composition work and studio work."

Goodman was commissioned to write the musical scores for two short films, one of which, Goodbye Rosebud, aired on Global Television and was screened at the Calgary Film Festival.

"I've been lucky that the door has been opened up to me to do film composition, which is an area where you can kind of have as your day job because it is very hard to support yourself performing jazz gigs. You do need to find something to supplement it."

With so much on his plate, Goodman said it was too difficult for him to think about what the future holds for him, but he did know that graduate school was in the cards. And he is aiming high.

"I'd probably apply to the Manhattan School of Music and Juilliard for music, and I'd probably apply to Columbia, Harvard and probably Oxford. I'd like to do something different that I could go into later, like law."

He said that when he does find the time to play gigs, he does so at jazz clubs in Toronto such as The Rex and every Wednesday, he plays at a restaurant called Bon Vivant on Avenue Road.

but a speck of dust floating somewhere in this vast universe. If this is the case, how big are you? How big am I? Who are you? Who am I? I don't know about you, but I do know about me. I am what I understand, and only what I understand. And what I understand about our Mother Earth is that she's in one heck of a mess! It is up to you and I to fix it - let's fix it. New online network sets its sights on Facebook

By JENNA ROSMAN

Special to The CJN

A new web platform called Inter-Canal is creating a buzz in the entertainment industry.

Greg Donskov, director of business development for Inter-Canal, a new advanced interactive network based in Toronto, said a digital renaissance is about to occur.

A musician who has written music for various television shows, including CSI Las Vegas, Donskov was the business development manager of the Bank of Montreal from the mid to late 1990s.

Inter-Canal CEO, Avi Gerber, 40, was an executive with the telecommunications company Ericsson Israel for more than 20 years.

Inter-Canal president, Erez Yerushalami, 30, is a veteran of the Israel Defence Forces' special forces.

Together, Donskov, Gerber and Yerushalami founded Inter-Canal two years ago.

"[Gerber] left his position with Ericsson. He took a huge gamble [in order to focus on this] startup. He uprooted his whole family to form this here in Toronto," Donskov said.

This past June, the Montreal-born Donskov and Israeli immigrants Gerber and Yerushalami launched Inter-Canal's "golden egg" – the Venice Chronicles, a social online network that they hope will blow sites like Facebook out of the water.

"You know of [websites such as] YouTube, Facebook and MySpace. All of these are great websites. All of them have certain functions, such as blogging, video and broadcasting capabilities. But they don't have everything," Donskov said. "If you look at Inter-Canal, we have all of them."

Donskov describes the venture as a "social platform for the entertainment industry."

The Venice Chronicles has so far attracted the 26- to 36-year-old demographic.

Las Vegas hotel executives from the Luxor, MGM Grand and Venetian hotel-casinos have expressed interest in using Inter-Canal's technology and web capabilities.

Aside from being able to upload photos to their profiles, site members can participate in role playing.

After uploading a photo, a new user is asked to choose a Venetian "mask," which is digitally placed over the picture, and then the user chooses a Venetian family to be a part of.

"The family has a history, and it's a unique way to have an alter ego, and a political rift – a difference between each other," Donskov said.

He said what separates this network from others is that users have the option of being part of every aspect of the online community.

"Normally [on Internet networks] you have segregation between the gaming community and the other types [of web surfers] that are into hooking up or dating, or just innocent networking.

"The Venice Chronicles is a cooler way of talking. We kind of amalgamated them, not just through the platform, but [through] the fans of this that are coming on board.

"We're getting young and professional and more mature women coming on board to network, maybe innocently flirt in a sophisticated way," Donskov said.

The site currently has more than 2,000 members.

Inter-Canal offers free membership to users through a system it created, in which users can obtain "internal credits," Donskov said.

The credits, or points, help the users advance within the game through various means, including by viewing a video commercial.

"We don't want [static banners] because it's unprofessional and it takes away from the atmosphere. We want an ability to have the advertiser happy and the user happy to say that they saw that commercial and they really liked it," he said.

"You would watch this if you get points, and these points serve to be real incentives. The advertisers are going to give incentives to those who view their advertising."

The Venice Chronicles website also has 24-hour-a-day live moderators online to assist members, including to help them collect internal Venetian currency, which serves to advance the user within the game.

In the future, Inter-Canal has plans for at least two more websites.

Catwalk would be used by modelling agents who are looking for female talent and professional models, as well as girls who would like to become models.

The Sports Chronicles, featuring celebrity or professional athletes, "would focus on what they do and all the aspects of their careers," Donskov said.

On Oct. 31, the Venetian Resort will host an online as well as a live masquerading event to promote the Venice Chronicles website.

For more information, visit www.venicechronicles.com.

Toronto dancers wow Israelis at Galilee festival

By RAPHAEL SUSSMAN
and EDITH KLEIN
Special to The CJN

KARMIEL, Israel — Braving 40-degree temperatures and blazing sun, Toronto's own Nirkoda dance group appeared at the prestigious Karmiel Dance Festival, held in the Galilee town of the same name from July 30 to Aug. 2.

The annual event, which regularly draws more than a quarter of a million spectators and 5,000 performers, is the highlight of the Israeli dance scene.

Nirkoda, the Israeli folk dance performing group associated with Toronto's Koffler Centre for the Arts, was warmly welcomed to the four-day event in northern Israel, appearing in several concerts over the course of the festival, which marked its 20th anniversary this year.

At each of the concert venues, reaction to the Canadian troupe was enthusiastic. Over the years, the festival's program has been filled by more and more modern, hip-hop, and avant garde dance, and Nirkoda's traditional approach to Israeli folk dancing was seen as a much-needed return to the festival's roots.

"It was great!" said Dvora Wolfe, a longtime resident of Karmiel. "It was such a pleasure to feel the music and recognize the history that the dances represented."

After each of Nirkoda's six appearances, the MCs called special attention to the Canadians' contribution, sparking applause and even a standing ovation after Nirkoda's tribute suite of dances based on Hebrew songs devoted to the Israeli north.

Over 250,000 attend annual event

The Karmiel Dance Festival has taken place each summer since 1988 and is the largest annual festival in Israel. During the 2006 war, when rockets fell on Karmiel every day, the event was postponed to the fall, but it was difficult for many professional troupes to reschedule their plans, so the program was a somewhat muted affair.

The entire town of Karmiel organizes to accommodate the event's 5,000 performers, putting schools, sports stadiums and cultural centres to festival purposes.

Dance styles run the gamut from modern ballet, hip-hop, ballroom and flamenco to, of course Israeli folk dance. The calibre is extremely high, as each performing group goes through a progressively more difficult selection process, beginning with a review of videos of their previous performances.

Ori Yinon, the senior director of Be'er Sheva's dance troupes who has been with the festival for the last 19 years and produced three of the shows in which Nirkoda performed this year, said that "Nirkoda brought us a taste of the old and beautiful Eretz Israel."

Yinon continued: "Shared cultural experiences like this serve to increase the solidarity between Israelis and Jews from the Diaspora."

Other countries represented at the festival included Turkey, Poland, the United States and Georgia. Several groups performed Indian and Japanese dances.

The Countefeiters highlights an intriguing footnote of the Holocaust

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Counterfeiters, written and directed by Stefan Ruzowitzky, an Austrian filmmaker, is a portrait of a Jewish master forger, Salomon Sorowitsch, whose dazzling technical skills enabled him to scrape through the Holocaust.

The movie, adapted from Adolf Burger's memoir, The Devil's Workshop, is based on real events and is an intriguing footnote in the annals of the Holocaust.

It was screened at the Toronto International Film Festival last week.

In 1942, the SS police force formed a team of counterfeiters recruited from the Sachsenhausen and Auschwitz concentration camps. In exchange for barely tolerable living conditions and the hope of survival, the inmates, consisting of Jews, dissidents and common criminals, agreed to help the Nazis counterfeit British and U.S. banknotes in Operation Benhard.

Its objective was to destabilize the British and American economies by flooding Britain and the United States with excellently forged currency.

Ruzowitzky's taut German-language film, starring Karl Markovics, revolves around Sorowitsch (Sally), a professional criminal of Russian origin who does not identify with his fellow Jews but who shares their fate when he is arrested and dispatched to a concentration camp.

The film opens in a Monte Carlo casino after the war, shifts to Berlin, where Sorowitsch was a wheeler-dealer before the war, segues to Mauthausen and Sachsenhausen, and ends in Monte Carlo.

The Band's Visit is simple yet profound

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A simple yet profound Israeli movie was screened at the Toronto International Film Festival last week.

The Band's Visit, by Eran Kolirin, turns on the magic of everyday conversation to break down the barriers created by political differences.

Kolirin is not interested in big, flavour-of-the-month issues. Instead, much to a viewer's pleasure, he looks for the small moments and the still smaller details that comprise a life.

Israel's relationship with Egypt, the first Arab country to formally recognize Israel within the framework of a peace treaty, is the broader context in which this modest yet thoroughly appealing film unfolds.

Although the treaty has endured through thick and thin since 1979, Egypt has recoiled from entering into cultural exchanges with Israel. Yet culture, in its wider sense, is the platform on which The Band's Visit is staged.

A big white van deposits the Alexandria Police Ceremonial Orchestra at a waiting area in what is presumably Ben-Gurion Airport.

Its eight members, dressed in snazzy powder blue uniforms, have arrived to perform at an Arab Cultural Centre somewhere in Israel. They wait patiently to be picked up, their suitcases and instruments resting on the pavement, but no one greets them.

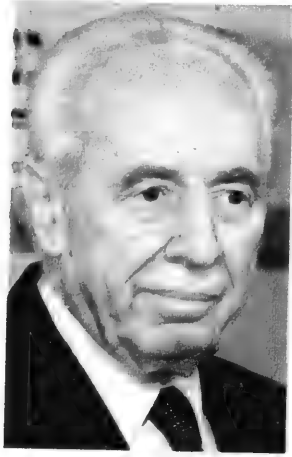
CELEBRATING 70 BEAUTIFUL YEARS 1937 - 2007

A time for unity — at home and abroad

A message from the president of the State of Israel, Shimon Peres, to Jewish communities of the Diaspora on Rosh Hashanah 5768.



Israeli President Shimon Peres

As we stand upon the threshold of the Jewish New Year and as I assume the presidency of the State of Israel, I would first and foremost like to share with you my deepest and most sincere desire for the continued prosperity, security, intellectual wealth and well-being of the Jewish people throughout the world, and that of all those who seek peace and tolerance.

It is a time for unity – both at home and abroad.

Within the wider framework of the dilemmas and challenges we face in the new era, the Jewish people are called upon to deal with issues and questions pertaining to our existence, our role in global initiatives and the shaping of our own identity. For many years, Israel had been perceived as a global "problem". Today, global challenges are as much on the Israeli agenda as they are issues which trouble the entire world.

It is thus called for that we work together to address these and future challenges – not merely to respond to them, but to dream and to create... to come up with strategic priorities, as profoundly as our people have demonstrated throughout history... to believe and to carry out... It is only via the consolidation of our efforts – those of Israel and the Jewish people – that we may truly lend a hand to shaping the future and the well-being of our people.

Living in a globalized world, "reality" inevitably becomes a dynamic and forever changing phenomenon, within which different communities are faced with varying circumstances and challenges. The Jewish people must not neglect the importance of collecting the single voices throughout the Jewish world and combining them into a comprehensive and meaningful whole. Our responsibility as a people, is to allow for all such voices to be heard. We must, both in Israel and throughout the Diaspora, learn the art of sensitivity and wisdom, which may allow us to extract the potential embedded in such voices. Our aim, throughout this process, must remain to promote an intellectual as well as qualitative partnership for the good of our people.

It is an inherent part of the Jewish heritage to seek global responsibilities within the framework of tikkun olam. Despite its small size, Israel has proved that it is capable of creating a unique economy. Similarly, it has become a global pioneer in the realm of scientific development. It is crucial that Israel continues to carve out a role for itself in the sphere of global science and technology and to serve as a pioneer in the infinite search for solutions to global challenges in the fields of education, telecommunications, agriculture, global warming and more. The Jewish people throughout the world have been, and continue to serve, as the backbone to such achievements. Together, the State of Israel and the Jews of the Diaspora have the inherent potential to contribute to forwarding peace and prosperity on a global level in general, and to consolidating Jewish existence in particular.

In order to make the aforementioned aspirations into a reality, regional partnerships must be nurtured and all available natural and human resources wisely used, in a bid to promote regional economic development and education for peace. No opportunity can be missed and every lead must be followed, in order to promote peace among ourselves and with our neighbours. Simultaneously, we must take the necessary measures to ensure the safety of Jewish life wherever it may be.

The State of Israel deeply values the participation of the Jewish communities around the world in the process of ensuring its well-being. Of particular value is the continued participation of the Jewish youth of today, and the leaders of the future. While we must continue to proudly cherish the Jewish heritage and ethics of our forefathers, our sights must also be set upon our children – for we must pave the way to their integration and growth within the new age.

Indeed, we stand on the edge of the present. We still face all manner of challenges and the greatest is not to let galloping prospects pass us by. This is our resolve. This is our prayer.

With Rosh Hashana at our doorstep, I convey, once more, my warmest personal wishes to you, your families and your communities for a year of peace and well-being.

CJC presidents' message

While we watch our brothers and sisters in Israel with trepidation and pride as they defend our Jewish state, we must realize that we, too, have a sacred trust – each of us must uphold Jewish honour in the Diaspora. We do so by becoming involved with amcha. We Jews are a small family, but we are joined by our common history and our love of both Canada and our spiritual home, Eretz Yisrael. We owe it to future generations to ensure both are strong, free and fiercely independent.

As we enter the High Holy Day season, we must commit to working for community now – we cannot put it off for another time. There is no greater threat to Jewish life in Canada than our own indifference. That is why we urge all of you to maintain an unflinching commitment to community. Stay informed, stay involved, and encourage those around you to help ensure Canada remains a country with uncompromising values, with no room for bigotry, hate or intolerance and plenty of room to achieve great things together.

Anti-Semitism has never been, and will never be, merely an isolated hatred. It is a blight that reaches beyond the Jewish community and acts as a precursor to a more massive hate that explodes onto society as a whole, spreading in all directions. An attack of anti-Semitism directed at the Jewish community is, for all intents and purposes, an attack on everything Canadians hold precious and dear. Canadian Jewish Congress stands on guard for the Jewish community and by so doing, stands on guard for Canada, in an effort to stamp out this insidious hatred.

We fervently wish members of the Jewish community a peaceful New Year, and we wish continued prosperity to Canada and to our beloved Israel.

Nirkoda performs Chassidic Dance (Shirei Shabbat) in Karmiel.

5,000 perfomers at Galilee festival

There were also tribute sessions to individuals such as famous Israel songwriter Yossi Banai and modern dance representations of traditional Jewish themes such as prayer rituals. There were performances by blind dancers, wheelchair dancers and dancers with special needs.

Many ordinary people come to Karmiel to dance themselves.

Folk dancing is very popular in Israel, and it's possible to dance every night of the week virtually anywhere in the country. New dances are being created weekly, with young and old rushing to learn the latest ones. The outdoor and indoor venues at Karmiel were packed all day and all night with folk dance enthusiasts from all over Israel and abroad.

Nirkoda was founded in 1957 in Toronto by Teme Kernerman and has performed at Jewish and Israeli events throughout Toronto.

It stopped performing in the mid-1980s. In 2001, some former members got together under the tutelage of Ronit Eizenman to form a new company. As the demand for performances at community events grew, the group expanded its ranks and repertoire, and it became affiliated with the Koffler Centre for the Arts in 2004.

The troupe members who could attend this year's Karmiel Festival were Sam Askenasi, Susie Blackstein-Adler, George Brody, Ronit Eizenman, Phillis Haimovitz-Willer, David Lefkowich, Abba Lustgarten, Manny Maya, Dalit Sharer, Ella Sussman, Raphie Sussman, and Ruthie Sutton.

"It was an honour to be a Canadian ambassador at such an event and to have our professional capabilities recognized by the leading choreographers of folk dance in Israel," said Eizenman, the group's artistic director and choreographer. "The warm receptions by the enthusiastic crowds made us feel right at home. It was a wonderful experience."

Yinon said that it's "important for Israelis to see that their passion for folk dancing is shared by the Jewish community all over the world. I would love to see more performances and youth groups from the Diaspora in the Karmiel Festival. It would provide them with a unique opportunity to experience an Israel that is full of fun and joy.

"We hope that Nirkoda will continue to participate in this annual celebration of Israeli dance".

Introducing Israeli food to the world

By DAVID BRINN
Special to The CJN

If you think that Israeli food consists of Jaffa oranges, Manischewitz wine and gefilte fish, then Janna Gur would like to set you straight.

Israeli food editor Janna Gur says pita is a way of life there, adding that you eat on the go.

The editor of Al Hashulchan (On the Table), the leading food and wine magazine in Israel, Gur is on a mission to show the world that through its location and a confluence of cultural factors, there's something special and exciting happening gastronomically in Israel.

"Food here is so – everything. It's politics, culture, esthetics, history, and I just love the whole thing," Gur said before a briefing she gave to foreign correspondents in Jerusalem upon publication of her new coffee table book of recipes – The Book of New Israeli Food.

Gur said the fact that Israel is a western society nestled in the heart of the eastern Mediterranean, and a society of immigrants who have brought a diversity of traditions from places as far-flung as Hungary and Morocco, Yemen and Poland, India and North America, Argentina and Algeria, has contributed to what she calls the "new Israeli food."

"Israeli food has changed drastically over the last 15 years. One thing is the improvement in the raw materials to produce wine, cheese, bread – you name it – and the ability to obtain fresh herbs and spices which are now available in every market and supermarket," Gur said.

She added that this, combined with a virtual revolution of upscale Israeli eateries and world-class chefs, propelled Israeli food into a new sphere unthought of a couple of decades ago when the culinary staples were basic and unimaginative.

"We should separate Israeli food from Israeli cuisine," Gur insisted. "When you're taking about cuisine – like French or Italian cuisine – Israeli cuisine as such doesn't exist yet. It's too soon, and besides, it's changing all the time.

"Israeli food is defined by the character of Israelis – we're outgoing, impatient. The climate is warm and sunny and that all reflects on the way we eat. The climate also affects agriculture – there's so much fresh produce all year round, it greatly influences the way we eat."

And the way Israelis eat encompasses everything from couscous and stuffed vegetables to unlimited variations on eggplant, lots of chicken and fish, loads of olive oil, and of course the staples – falafel and shwarma.

Gur said that, if necessary, a formula can be created to define Israeli food: salad, which accompanies almost every meal ("We're probably the only people on the planet that eats vegetables for breakfast"); pita ("A way of life here. You eat on the go"); hummus ("Nowhere in the world has hummus reached such an elevated state as in Israel – it's almost a cult food"); and lots of fresh fruits, vegetables and grilled meats.

"Then you add in the Jewish traditions of holidays and Shabbat, and you basically have the chapters of my book," she said with a laugh.

The Book of New Israeli Food (in English) is a large-format, full-colour illustrated album brimming with more than 150 recipes – both traditional and innovative – stories and images of the nation and its unique landscapes and cityscapes, and plenty of advice on special ingredients, cooking techniques and serving suggestions.

The varied dishes and creations of talented local chefs are highlighted by snapshots from streets, markets, village and city life, restaurants, cafes and home kitchens, creating what Gur hopes is a culinary and cultural voyage.

Born and raised in the former Soviet Union, Gur immigrated to Israel as a teenager in 1974 and worked as a translator before entering the publishing business with her husband in the early 1990s. While she's become known as an Israeli gastronomic expert through her connection with the 17-year-old Al Hashulchan, Gur's decision to write a book on the subject was slow to percolate.

"I was sort of 'cooking' it for awhile," she said. "I like the concept of estrangement – to write about something you know so well for somebody who comes from the outside. I believed strongly that there was a story to tell here, in terms of both Israeli food's uniqueness and its quality."

A visit to a New York City bookshop that specialized only in cookbooks proved to be the impetus for her to actively begin thinking about a writing a book about Israeli food.

"That was the first seed. I was talking to the staff there and formulated the idea for a book that someone could buy for a Rosh Hashanah present or a gift to bring back from a visit to Israel. There's this genre of books, a combination of cookbook, tourist book and coffee table book," she said.

"In many books like this, the recipes end up being there just for decoration, an afterthought. What was important, and what I hope we achieved is that the recipes are all relevant and useful."

Gur and her staff were meticulous about providing background for the various dishes highlighted, and were careful to check all the ingredients to make sure they would be available in other locales besides Israel.

Sutton Group Admiral blazes new trails in real estate

Murray Goldkind

Using a simple formula of maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents, Sutton Group Admiral Realty has experienced the kind of spectacular growth that has surpassed even its own high expectations.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team, which now numbers over 200 agents, has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to enter the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Brokers Of Record and co-owners Saul and Murray Goldkind pride themselves on their ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't." And implicit in this value, he notes, is the quality of service provided by the broker or agent. "If you have to do more than say, 'I'll take the red one,' we're not doing our job."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Quality chefs blend the old and the new

"There are so many Middle Eastern markets and groceries around the world that if you want to buy techinah or halvah, you can get it pretty easily," said Gur.

One area regarding Israeli food that Gur deliberated on for a long time is the kashrut factor. Ultimately, she made all the recipes and ingredients in the book kosher, but said that ironically, the best Israeli restaurants are not kosher.

"It's very sad," she said. "But the best restaurants and chefs like Haim Cohen at Keren in Tel Aviv and Ezra Kedem at Acadia in Jerusalem are not kosher. Israeli food definitely does necessarily mean kosher food.

"But it's not that difficult in Israel to make kosher recipes. The traditional ingredients here don't include seafood or pork. Using butter and cream in recipes is not part of most Mediterranean recipes; you can just as easily use olive oil."

Despite the decision to exclude non-kosher recipes, Gur sees the book as an Israeli cookbook, not a kosher cookbook.

"These are recipes of Israeli food, not necessarily Jewish food. That's why, in the holiday chapter, you have a section on the Muslim holiday of Ramadan – it's a valid part of Israeli culture," she said.

Gur demurs when asked to choose a favourite dish from the dozens of recipes in the book, but admits a weakness for the chapter on stuffed vegetables. While the cobbler's children don't quite go barefoot in this case, Gur's home culinary skills centre around the non-Israeli staple pasta, according to her teenage son Amit, who accompanied her to Jerusalem.

"I think that's my forte, along with salads," she said, adding that she's a food writer, not a chef.

This is fine, because quality chefs now abound in Israel, a development that Gur attributes to many things.

"The new generation of Israeli chefs almost all were either trained abroad or worked abroad at some point. And more importantly, they all chose cooking because they loved it. It used to be that people would choose it as a vocation, the same way they could have gone into computers or become an airline pilot," she said.

"The whole global development of food as recreation has also affected us, and the local chefs draw their inspiration from local ingredients and sources often within the character of their own family – especially if they come from a place with a rich culinary heritage like Iraq, Morocco or Persia. The chef at Raphael in Tel Aviv has a legendary Moroccan grandmother named Aviva, who was his first cooking teacher. He loved the dishes she made. And there you'll find the fusion of many of the top restaurants today, mixing the old and the new."

Gur hopes her book will do its part in helping inform the world that the words Israel and food should be mentioned in the same breath. She says tourists and food professionals who visit are stunned by the variety and quality of Israeli restaurants.

The book has already been licensed for translation in Germany, and Gur is looking for a publisher in the United States. In the meantime, she is selling it herself via the Al Hashulchan website.

"My mission is to tell the world about Israeli food – that there's something interesting going on food-wise."

HOMEMADE SHAWARMA

This process is very different from the way traditional shawarma is made, but the result is quite similar and extremely tasty. Deboned chicken thighs are baked in the oven and stir-fried prior to serving. Extended marinating in a massive amount of spices gives the chicken fantastic flavours and a tantalizing colour. While you're at it, prepare a double quantity of the seasoning mix and keep in the freezer. This recipe was developed by a talented amateur cook, Israel Scherrer.

Food, Scrumptious Food

Friends share their favourite holiday recipes

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

More than 17 years ago, a group of about 10 mostly Thornhill women decided to meet on Tuesday evenings in order to conduct their own weight loss group.

They would weigh in, talk about their week, and because they all had small children at home, enjoy an evening away from their family responsibilities.

Eventually, friendship got in the way of weight loss discussions, and although they still weigh in monthly, evenings now consist of talking about their week, supporting each other through life's ups and downs, and generally having fun.

Of course, no group of Jewish women has ever met without talking about food and what they plan to serve or prepare for their holiday meals. The following is a sampling of some of their favourite recipes:

SWEET POTATO PUFF

Submitted by Barbara Winberg

4 large sweet potatos, peeled, cubed and cooked in salted water until fork tender
¼ cup butter or pareve margarine
½ cup brown sugar
2 eggs
2 tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. nutmeg (optional)

Mash the sweet potatoes to a smooth consistency. Allow to cool slightly.

Stir in butter, brown sugar, cinnamon and nutmeg (if using). In a separate small bowl, whip eggs with a fork until light yellow colour, stir into sweet potato mixture. Place in a greased casserole with high sides (e.g. souffle dish) and bake at 350 for about 45 minutes.

Makes a nice fluffy dish best served in the container it was baked in. Works well in a buffet.

ZESTY GARLIC CHICKEN

Submitted by Lillian Sweet

Lillian says that since before she got married, Norene Gilletz has been a constant source of recipes, "because her instructions are clear enough for the most novice cook." This is one of her favourites from Meal-lean-i-Yumm.

3 onions, sliced
11-oz. can tomato mushroom sauce
3½ lb. chicken, cut up
15 cloves garlic (about 1 head), peeled pepper, paprika and basil to taste
½ cup Szechuan-style duck sauce

Preheat oven to 350. Spray a large roasting pan with non-stick spray. Place onions in bottom of pan. Remove skin and trim fat from chicken. Place chicken in roasting pan on top of onions. Crush 3 of the garlic cloves and rub them over the chicken. Season with pepper, paprika and basil. Pour tomato sauce and duck sauce over chicken. Scatter remaining garlic around chicken. Cover pan tightly with foil. Bake at 350 covered for 1½ hours. Uncover and bake 30 minutes longer, basting occasionally with pan juices. Reheats and/or freezes well. Recipe can be doubled.

GEFILTE FISH LOAF

Submitted by Shirley Kellerstein

2 lb. whitefish (or your favourite combination – I use whitefish and pike)
2 carrots
2 large onions
2 tbsp. oil
¼ cup cold water
3 eggs
2 tbsp. matzah meal
2½ tsp. salt
1 tsp. black pepper
1½ tbsp. sugar

Preheat oven to 350. Line loaf pan with heavy-duty foil and brush lightly with oil. Grate carrots and onions (can be done in food processor) and saute lightly in oil. Beat eggs in large mixing bowl, add water, seasonings and matzah meal and mix. Add veggies and fish to egg mixture and mix very well. Pour into loaf pan (can brush lightly with oil, if desired). Bake for 1 hour and 10 minutes.

Shawarma with a difference

3-lb. 5-oz. deboned chicken thighs

Marinade
¾ cup olive oil
3 tbsp. curry powder
2 tbsp. garam masala (Indian seasoning mix, available in spice shops)
1 tbsp. chicken soup mix

For Frying
3 tbsp. oil
3 onions, sliced
salt and freshly ground black pepper

Mix the marinade ingredients in a disposable baking dish (the most practical because the process is messy). Add the chicken and mix well. Marinate for a minimum of 5 hours (or overnight) in the refrigerator.

Preheat the oven to 400. Bake for 45 minutes. The entire process up to this point may be completed a day or two ahead and the baked chicken stored in the refrigerator.

Before serving, finely slice the chunks of chicken. Fry the onion in oil until golden and remove from the pan.

Add the chicken with some of the marinade to the pan. Season and stir-fry for a few minutes, until the edges are golden-brown. Spread the fried onions over the meat and serve.

HONEY CRUMB CHICKEN

Submitted by Frieda Woznica

1 chicken, cut into eight pieces seasoned bread crumbs or seasoned matzah meal (seasoned with paprika, garlic powder, salt and pepper, to taste; or use a "Shake 'n Bake" type mix like Croydon House NoFri)
1/2 cup honey

Preheat oven to 350. Wash the chicken. Coat the chicken pieces with the crumbs. (It is best to put the crumbs in a Baggie and shake the pieces to coat evenly.) Spread the chicken in a single layer on a flat cookie sheet and place in oven. After 30 minutes, drizzle witht the honey and put back in the oven for another 20-25 minutes. This freezes well. I usually undercook it by 5-10 minutes, then thaw out at room temperature and reheat in a 350-degree oven for about 15 minutes. This recipe is originally from Second Helpings, Please.

CRANBERRY BRISKET

Submitted by Sandy Kershen from her friend Shelly

1 brisket
1 can whole cranberries
1 cup water
1 package onion soup mix

Mix cranberries, water and soup mix together in roasting pan. Add brisket and cover with mixture. Marinate at least one hour, but I prefer overnight in the fridge. Preheat oven to 325. Cook covered until done. The time will depend on the size of the roast.

If it is a really large piece of meat, you can double the mixture. I prefer to add a bag of small baby carrots and small potatoes around the brisket.

BANANA CHOCOLATE CAKE

Submitted Nadyne Gazen

1 package chocolate cake mix
7 extremely ripe bananas (black peel)

Puree bananas and mix with cake mix. Do not use eggs or oil. Bake according to instructions on box. Test before removing from oven. Might need a few extra minutes. Can be frosted with any icing. I like the banana icing recipe from Second Helpings, Please (recipe below).

BANANA ICING

2 tbsp. butter or margarine
1/4 tsp. lemon juice
1/4 cup mashed bananas
1 1/2 cups sifted icing sugar

Combine all ingredients and blend until smooth. Yields enough icing for a 9-inch-square cake.

Captured Hamas chief is bargaining chip for Shalit

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The kidnapped senior Hamas commander Mahawesh al-Qadi is a bargaining chip in the effort to free captive Israel Defence Forces Cpl. Gilad Shalit, said Public Security Minister Avi Dichter on Monday.

Dichter was partially lifting an official veil of secrecy over the kidnapping last week of the Hamas executive force officer.

The IDF and Israeli officials have refused to comment on Palestinian accounts of the kidnapping, in which undercover Israeli soldiers, dressed in the uniform used by the executive force, reportedly lured Qadi out of his car by having one of their members pose as an old man needing help at the side of a rural road. The soldiers, waiting in a Subaru in a grove on the outskirts of Rafah, then allegedly bundled him into the car and drove to the nearby Dahaniya airfield, from which witnesses said he was flown by helicopter to an unknown destination.

Qadi is a senior operative in Hamas' military wing. He is believed to have been closely involved in the June 2006 kidnapping of Shalit during a Hamas-led attack on an IDF post within Israel and adjacent to the Gaza Strip.

Without mentioning Qadi by name, Dichter confirmed in an interview with Army Radio that the government viewed him as a bargaining chip in negotiations for Shalit's freedom.

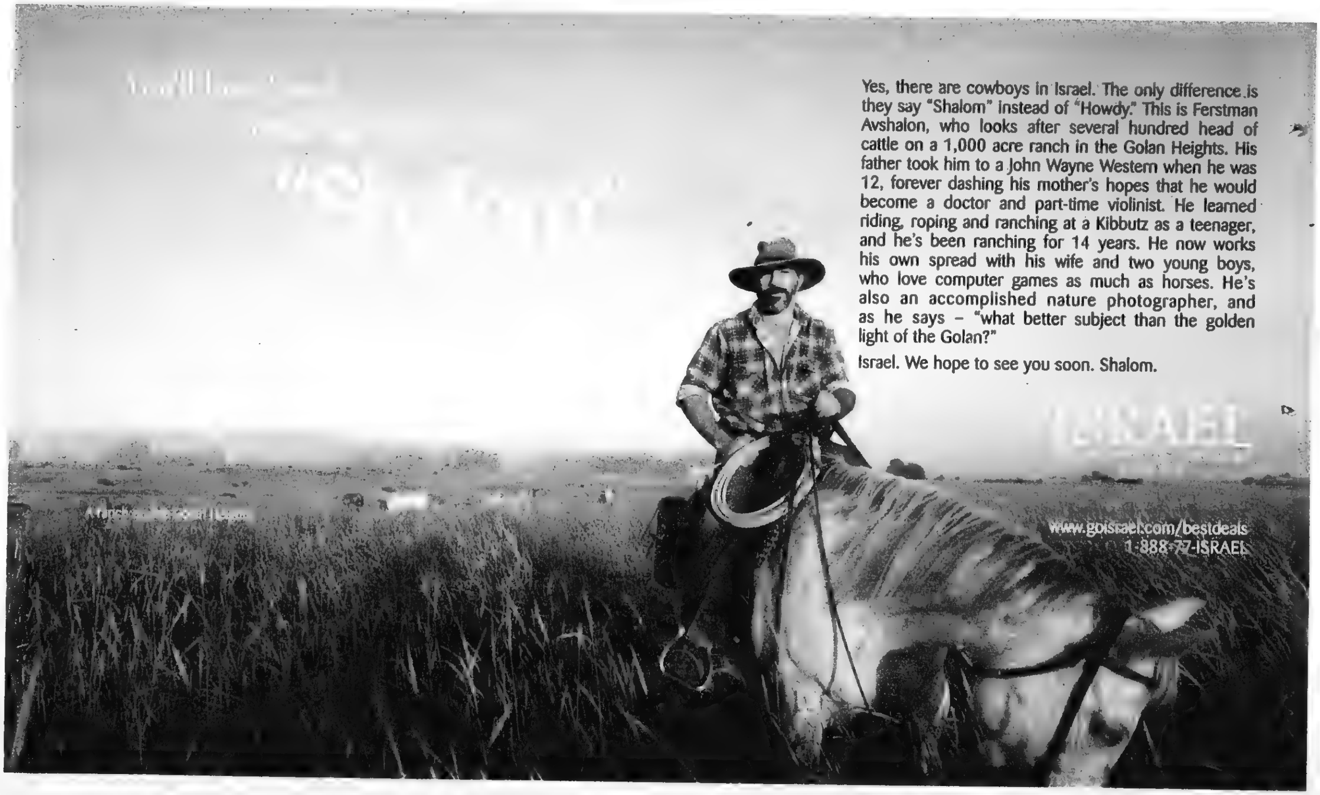
He cited the cases of Sheikh Abd al Karim Obeid and Mustafa Dirani, Lebanese militant commanders abducted by Israel and later freed in an exchange for the bodies of three IDF serviceman and a kidnapped Israeli businessman. Dichter called Obeid and Dirani "very important bargaining chips in bringing our boys home – to my sorrow, the bodies of our boys."

Avi Dichter

Dichter said that while the intelligence that Israel could gain from Qadi was mainly relevant to the period up to the point of his capture, "there are additional elements that are always current.

"Every method, every technique used to gain additional intelligence is welcome and very important to the effort to bring Gilad Shalit home. Second, the ability to obtain additional 'assets' with concrete relevance to the release of Gilad Shalit is an enormous advantage.

"We will free Gilad Shalit through negotiations, at the end of which terrorists will be released to the Palestinian Authority or to Hamas in Gaza, and we will receive Gilad Shalit in return," Dichter said.



Yes, there are cowboys in Israel. The only difference is they say "Shalom" instead of "Howdy." This is Ferstman Avshalon, who looks after several hundred head of cattle on a 1,000 acre ranch in the Golan Heights. His father took him to a John Wayne Western when he was 12, forever dashing his mother's hopes that he would become a doctor and part-time violinist. He learned riding, roping and ranching at a Kibbutz as a teenager, and he's been ranching for 14 years. He now works his own spread with his wife and two young boys, who love computer games as much as horses. He's also an accomplished nature photographer, and as he says – "what better subject than the golden light of the Golan?"

Israel. We hope to see you soon. Shalom.

PM, Abbas discuss Palestinian statehood

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas met on Monday in an effort to narrow differences over Palestinian statehood ahead of a U.S.-sponsored conference in November.

Israeli and Palestinian officials said the talks, which took place in Jerusalem, sought to lay the ground for next week's planned visit of U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

While Abbas is pushing for a detailed document that will include a precise timetable for implementing an agreement, Olmert prefers a one-page document that lists five general principles that will serve as guidelines.

Prior to Monday's meeting in Jerusalem, Israeli political sources said that Olmert and Abbas would not sign an agreement of principles but would focus on formulating an "agreed-upon" document.

It is still unclear how the document would be presented during the summit – whether in the form of a joint declaration by the two leaders, or parallel declarations; or as a summary statement in which U.S. President George W. Bush, who will host the summit, would also participate.

For his part, Abbas has asked Olmert to begin writing the document of principles that will be presented at the summit, Palestinian sources say. The two leaders have so far carried out "brainstorming sessions" during their meetings, but now Abbas would like to progress to formulating a document that can be used as a basis for an agreement.

One of the main purposes of Monday's meeting was for the two leaders to pinpoint the points of both agreement and dispute, in anticipation of their planned meeting with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Rice will try to negotiate the points of dispute with the two.

Palestinian sources said Sunday that the Gulf states and Saudi Arabia have asked the United States to pressure Israel to make it possible for an agreement of principles to be completed by the date of the summit. The same sources maintain that these countries have threatened not to participate in the meeting unless an agreement is ready.

The prime minister has also briefed Attorney General Menachem Mazuz on the developments in the talks with Abbas, sources in Jerusalem said. The attorney general is of the view that Olmert will have to bring any agreement with the Palestinian Authority before the Knesset for its approval. However, Mazuz believes that in the case of a less definitive document, such as a shared declaration, it would be sufficient, from a legal point of view, to seek only cabinet approval.

It is therefore likely that Olmert will make do with the lesser document, one that only his cabinet will be required to support, thereby minimizing political friction and possible pressure from his right-wing coalition partners.

Meanwhile, Shin Bet chief Yuval Diskin briefed the cabinet Sunday on what he described as "the incessant efforts of terrorist organizations to carry out attacks in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip." Diskin said that there has been a rise in both the number of Qassam rocket attacks and the efforts to carry out manned attacks.

"Hamas is trying to restore its military infrastructure in the West Bank in order to carry out an attack," Diskin said, adding that the PA's security forces are hard at work to contain such efforts, even though "their capabilities at this stage are limited."

Eisen inaugurated at JTS

NEW YORK — The new chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America said his mission is to focus on mitzvah, mission and Muslims.

At his official inauguration last Wednesday at the Conservative movement's flagship seminary, Arnold Eisen laid out an ambitious program for the coming year that includes a review of the seminary curriculum for rabbinical and cantorial students, expanded dialogue with Christians and Muslims, and a sharpening of the movement's message, beginning with a focus on the concept of mitzvah.

Arnold Eisen

Eisen, the institution's seventh chancellor, said he wants to provide "clear formulations, well-articulated and cogently argued, of my understanding of this movement. I want to share my understanding, in all humility and with full respect for other voices in our community, that this is the way on which God and Torah want us to walk."

He rejected talk of the Conservative movement's supposed "malaise," a term used by his predecessor, Rabbi Ismar Schorsch, in his final commencement address last year.

"Malaise is in the eye or head of the beholder," Eisen said, as Rabbi Schorsch, seated behind him on the dais, looked on. "It is certainly not in mine."

Young U.S. Jews less attached to Israel, study finds

By SUE FISHKOFF
JTA

SAN FRANCISCO — Young American Jews are increasingly alienated from Israel, according to a report released last week.

For the most part, the report, titled Beyond Distancing: Young Adult American Jews and their Alienation from Israel and commissioned by the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies, substantiates current suspicions rather than revealing new surprises.

The major findings are that successively younger American Jews feel increasingly distant from Israel, and that this trend has been increasing steadily for decades. For example, less than half (48 per cent) of respondents under 35 agreed that "Israel's destruction would be a personal tragedy," compared to 78 per cent of those 65 and older. And just 54 per cent of the younger group are "comfortable with the idea of a Jewish State," compared to 81 per cent of those 65 or older, 74 per cent of those 50-64 and 64 per cent of the 35-49 age

The report is based on data from the 2007 National Survey of American Jews, a mail-back and web-administered survey conducted in December 2006 and January 2007 by Synovate, Inc. It only considers the attitudes of non-Orthodox Jews. Of 1,828 respondents, 124 Orthodox Jews were removed from the sample, on the assumption that their relationship to Israel is markedly closer than that of their non-Orthodox peers.

According to one of the report's co-authors, Steven Cohen, a sociologist and research professor at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in New York, the generational differences are more a function of the decade people were born than where they are on the life-cycle continuum. That means the American Jewish detachment from Israel will increase as younger Jews age and replace their parents and grandparents' generations.

"There is growing discomfort with the drawing of hard group boundaries of all sorts," Cohen said of the so-called "millennials," those born after 1980. "The idea of a Jewish state reflects hard group boundaries, that there is a distinction between Jews and everybody else. That does not sit well with young Jews."

Overall, the picture of detachment from Israel is not as dismal as those figures might suggest, Cohen argued. More than 60 per cent of Jews under 35 in the study show "some level" of attachment to or caring about Israel.

"The glass is still half-full, it's just not as full as it used to be," said Cohen, who co-wrote the report with Ari Kelman, assistant professor of American studies at the University of California at Davis.

The overall slide in attachment to or interest in Israel does not mean that young American Jews are less "Jewish." On the contrary, numerous recent studies and anecdotal evidence demonstrate great cultural and religious vitality and creativity among young Jews. Israel is just not as much a part of the picture, and that should concern the greater community, the report warns.

"It's worrying that young Jews may be creating a latter-day Jewish Bundism, which affirms Jewish belonging but is neutral to the Zionist enterprise," Cohen told JTA. "We're seeing this growing phenomenon of Jews who have no problem saying the Shema, but won't sing Hatikvah."

More trips to Jewish state said to increase affinity

One factor that seems to increase young Jews' attachment to Israel quite dramatically is, not surprisingly, spending time in Israel, according to the new report.

While 19 per cent of young Jews who have never been to Israel exhibit a "high" level of attachment to the country, that number jumps to 34 per cent after a first trip, and 52 per cent after two or more trips to Israel.

Conversely, 42 per cent of young Jews who have never been to Israel report a "low" level of attachment. That number drops to 17 per cent after just one trip.

The policy implications? "Trips matter," Cohen and Kelman write, "more trips are better than fewer, and trips of longer duration have more impact than those with shorter duration."

"In some ways, that's the most dramatic finding" of the report, said Barry Chazan, professor of Jewish education at Spertus College in Chicago and educational director of birthright israel, which has taken close to 150,000 college-age and post-college Jews to Israel over the past seven years.

The finding confirms what Chazan and his colleagues have been telling people: taking young American Jews to Israel on these free, carefully organized trips is a powerful tool in Jewish identity building.

"The motivation is strong, they're not being dragged there," he said. "They get a hefty dose of Zionist history, Jewish history and contemporary Israel. It's very explicitly about that."

Chazan has just finished a book about birthright, scheduled for publication in spring 2008, with Leonard Saxe, director of the Cohen Center for Modern Jewish Studies at Brandeis University.

The two dispute the Cohen-Kelman report's prediction of a continuing downslide in American Jewish attachment to Israel and say birthright has a lot to do with their optimism.

"Tens of thousands of young adults are having these experiences in Israel," Saxe said. "It will create a generation of people who know Israel and are interested in Israel that is unprecedented."

Saxe pointed out that registration for this winter's birthright programs opened Sept. 5. By 10 a.m., 6,000 people had signed up.

"If there's that much interest in Israel and in travelling to Israel," he concluded, "it's hard to say we're facing a crisis."

Tilly Shames, the associate director of Hillel of Greater Toronto, said that although there are sure to be generational differences on the issue of Israel, she suspects that the American experience is different from the Canadian one.

She said she agrees with the report's findings that trips to Israel help build stronger connections.

"Statistically, Canada has a much higher percentage of youth who have spent time in Israel on short-term programs, like birthright, and long-term programs, like university abroad or volunteer experiences. These experiences create a stronger connection to Israel among our youth, a stronger connection to Jewish community at home, and a greater desire to return to Israel on follow-up programs," Shames said.

Based on her experience at Hillel, she said students are more interested in Israel programming than any other type.

"This is why we balance our programming with social action projects, Jewish learning, social events, sports, etc. We know Israel doesn't resonate with all our students and we have to offer them a diverse array of opportunities to connect to their community."

Anti-Semitism in Britain stoking unease among Jews

By VANESSA BULKACZ
JTA

LONDON — With anti-Semitism in Britain at record levels, life is changing in subtle and not-so-subtle ways for the country's Jews.

Vendors sell Arabic-language editions of The Protocols of the Elders of Zion outside train stations. Academic and labour unions routinely issue calls to boycott the Jewish state.

Jews in Britain say they feel a growing sense of unease and insecurity.

"Jews today, compared with three or four years ago, are feeling increasingly worried about anti-Semitism," said Mark Gardner, a spokesperson for the Community Security Trust (CST), the organization charged with providing security for the country's Jews.

Apparently, they have good reason to worry. A recent CST report showed that all forms of anti-Semitism in Britain increased in 2006.

Last year saw the highest number of reported anti-Semitic incidents in Britain since record-keeping began in 1984 – a 33 per cent increase over the previous year. Anti-Semitic incidents in Britain have doubled in the last decade.

Jews are violently assaulted and subjected to threats. Schoolchildren face abuse. Communal property and synagogues are damaged and desecrated. And Britain is home to a growing cottage industry of mass-produced, anti-Semitic literature.

The sharp rise in anti-Semitism has not gone unnoticed in Parliament, which in 2005 formed an investigative committee to address the Jewish community's concerns.

In its first report in September 2006, the All-Party Inquiry into Anti-Semitism recommended investigating the reason for the low number of prosecutions of anti-Semitic crimes and developing strategies to combat rising anti-Semitism. The report, which is available at http://thepcaa.org/Report.pdf, found that only a minority of police forces in the country were even equipped to record hate crimes as anti-Semitic incidents.

"Anti-Semitism has not been taken as seriously as other forms of hatred in some parts of our society," Iain Wright, the parliamentary undersecretary of state for communities and local government, acknowledged this summer.

Wright pledged to increase significantly funding for monitoring and classifying anti-Semitism as a hate crime.

But are any of these responses to the problem making Jews feel safer?

In some communities, residents are volunteering to help provide security for Jews.

"Community leaders are trying to find ways to harness the fact that people want to help," Gardner said.

For secular Jews in Britain, who may not be subject to the same street dangers that visibly Orthodox Jews face, the country's increasingly populist anti-Israeli campaigns have been unsettling.

"When people start talking about how terrible Israel is behaving, I feel sensitive about it and how it might possibly be linked to anti-Semitism, even if it wasn't meant that way," said Lauren Tobias, who works in London. "Then I find myself acting very defensive."

Gardner said the boycott Israel movement "has an anti-Semitic impact psychologically on the Jewish community. Boycotts remind us of the Nazi boycott of Jews."

One British journalist, Richard Littlejohn, said bashing Israel has become so trendy that it is "this year's AIDS ribbon."

As in other places in Europe, anti-Semitism in Britain isn't limited to the extreme right. On the far left, in unions and other forums where liberal-leaning Jews once felt politically at home, activists now leading the charge against Israel are driving Jews away.

Josephine Bacon, director of a Hebrew and Yiddish translation company, said she feels under attack at her volunteer office job in the Labour Party.

"I get incredible hostility at work at the Camden Labour Party," said Bacon, who holds dual British and Israeli citizenship. "The only reason it's not the same as the anti-Semitism of the '30s is that Israel exists now."

Bacon says many Jews are "voting with their feet" and cutting ties with the Labour Party, Bacon said, or "if they stay in the party, they don't talk about their past."

Anti-Israel activists by and large reject accusations that their campaigns are anti-Semitic.

Ian McDonald, a senior lecturer from Brighton who supports the University and College Union's proposed academic boycott of Israel, said in debates about the boycott, "We have to challenge the notion that to be anti-Zionist is to be anti-Semitic."

At a recent debate on the All-Party Inquiry into Anti-Semitism, Wright called the boycott proposal "anti-Jewish in principle." But that pronouncement hasn't changed matters much on the streets.

Last year, the CST launched a program to safeguard Jewish schools and community centres, pledging more than $6 million (US) over a three-year period to install bomb-proof windows in some 600 community buildings.

Despite those efforts to help religious communities across the country beef up security, for some it hasn't been enough.

British Jews are choosing to move to Israel in record numbers. British aliyah last year set a new record with 738 new immigrants, a two-thirds increase over the year before, according to the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Nevertheless, agency spokesperson Michael Jankelowitz doesn't believe the aliyah is the result of British Jews fleeing anti-Semitism at home.

"By and large the reasons for aliyah are positive ones," he said.

Bacon said that despite the hostility she faces in Britain, she has no plans to move.

"I'm determined to tough it out. I think that the current wave of anti-Semitism will eventually die out.

"But I can't say how soon."

Controversial prof resigns from DePaul

JTA

CHICAGO — A DePaul University professor who suggested Jews have exploited the Holocaust for political gain has resigned.

Norman Finkelstein quit after the university cancelled his only remaining class. Finkelstein and DePaul announced the resignation in a joint statement Sept. 5, the day Finkelstein had vowed to present himself at his office and commit an act of civil disobedience if denied entrance. Finkelstein would not disclose the terms of his departure.

Finkelstein had drawn ire for his trenchant criticism of Israel and suggesting that the legacy of the Holocaust has been exploited. Earlier this year Finkelstein was denied tenure at DePaul after a public campaign waged against him by Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz.

Some see in Finkelstein a courageous truth-teller suppressed for failing to toe the party line.

Last week, Finkelstein told supporters it was time to move on "for everybody's sake," Associated Press reported.

"DePaul students rose to dazzling spiritual heights in my defence that should be the envy of and an example for every university in the United States," Finkelstein said after a rally held on his behalf.

Israel Briefs

Syria fires on warplane

Syria fired at Israeli military aircraft that Syria said entered its airspace. The incident occurred in the early hours of last Thursday morning, according to the Syrian military, which said several Israeli planes flew over the country near the Turkish-Syrian border and dropped some ammunition. Other Syrian sources said four or five planes dropped fuel tanks in the Syrian desert. The Israel Defence Forces declined to respond to the report, saying, "It is not our custom to respond to these kinds of reports." But sources told Israeli media it appeared the IDF committed an "operational mishap." Israel's air force regularly trains in Turkey, raising the possibility that a warplane or warplanes had gone off course. Israel also conducts regular reconnaissance flights over Syria.

Israel censured

Israel, not Hezbollah, was to blame for most civilian deaths during last year's Lebanon war, Human Rights Watch said. In a scathing report, the New York-based watchdog said its investigators had determined that Israeli air force and artillery shelling caused most of some 900 Lebanese civilian deaths during the July-August conflict. It rejected Israel's argument that Hezbollah invited the heavy toll by operating among noncombatants and thus turning them into "human shields." Israel disputed the report's findings, reiterating that its armed forces abided by rules of war. A Foreign Ministry spokesperson noted that during the 34-day conflict, a UN official censured Hezbollah for shielding among civilians. Human Rights Watch has also condemned Hezbollah's wartime launch of 4,000 rockets into Israel.

Refugees get citizenship

Israel's interior minister said Israel will offer citizenship to some of the estimated 300 refugees in the country from Sudan's Darfur region. Meir Sheetrit said that some of the refugees will become Israelis but that Israel may cap the number it will naturalize. Some 2,500 to 3,000 Sudanese have crossed illegally into Israel from Egypt in recent years, but Israeli government sources say only about 10 per cent are said to be from Darfur. They say the remainder are economic migrants or refugees from other conflict-torn regions of Sudan.

Prince Edward visits Israel

Britain's Prince Edward was in Israel for a four-day tour last week. This first visit to Israel by a member of the British Royal Family in more than 10 years was prompted by an invitation to the 43-year-old Earl of Wessex by the Israel Youth Award program, which was started some 50 years ago by Edward's father, Prince Phillip. Edward visited the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem, where a tree was planted in honour of his grandmother, Princess Alice. She was recognized in 1993 as a gentile from the Righteous Among the Nations for sheltering three members of the Cohen family in her home in Athens during the Holocaust.

Fence to be rerouted

Israel's High Court of Justice ordered a controversial section of the West Bank security fence rerouted. A three-justice panel under High Court President Dorit Beinisch ordered the Defence Ministry to come up with a new plan for Bil'in, a Palestinian village currently slated to lose swaths of farmland to the fence. Finding in favour of a petition filed two years ago by Palestinian activists, Beinisch wrote that the fence threatens to cause "significant hardship" to Bil'in residents and therefore should circumvent the village. Bil'in has seen almost weekly clashes between pro-Palestinian protesters and Israeli security forces.

'We need to keep striving,' cancer researcher says

Dr. Aaron Schimmer, seen in his lab at Princess Margaret Hospital.

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Aaron Schimmer has an unexpectedly frequent smile for someone who oversees about 30 cancer research projects.

"There've been some dramatic success stories," he said in an interview earlier this summer in his office at Princess Margaret Hospital.

One leukemia patient who received experimental therapy went into an extended remission that outlasted her predicted survival time without the therapy.

Although her cancer returned and she did not survive – highlighting "how we need to keep striving to improve our treatments," Schimmer said in an update last week – her remission and similar results encourage him and his colleagues "to keep moving forward… even if [we're talking about] the rare outcome.

"When you're dealing with very serious conditions, you make a real difference in the lives of patients… and I guess for some subgroups who do extremely well," he said. "For those groups of patients, it's exceptionally gratifying to be able to help them."

In May, Schimmer, 38, was named one of Canada's Top 40 under 40, a program of the Caldwell Partners, a national executive search firm. The awards are based on achievements in areas such as vision and leadership, innovation and achievement, and community involvement.

It is one of more than 30 awards and honours Schimmer has received for academic achievement, including an award from Ontario's ministry of research and innovation for young researchers. His studies are funded by national and international granting organizations, including the Canadian Cancer Society and the Multiple Myeloma Research Foundation.

"I like to think what drives a lot of research is the experience in the clinic," said Schimmer, who has authored more than 40 papers. "As you treat patients, it generates questions [such as], 'Why didn't the drugs work?' Or sometimes even more interesting, 'Why did this medication, which didn't work in many others, work in this patient?' "

Research is rarely done in a vacuum, he explained, citing published studies and clinical work as sources that generate new research projects. Although most of his time is spent in research, Schimmer also spends a half day a week treating leukemia and related disorders.

An assistant professor in the departments of medicine and biophysics at the University of Toronto, Schimmer found his niche in hematology – particularly the study of blood cancers – when he spent time working in a research lab as part of his training in internal medicine. He received his PhD in molecular biology in 2001, and spent two years in La Jolla, Calif., doing a post-doctoral fellowship.

In his earlier student years, Schimmer – a graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto – took part in a different type of research, studying the changing Bedouin culture in the Israeli desert on a Weizmann Institute of Science program. He is still involved with the institute through Weizmann Science Canada.

Current research is focused on finding targeted therapy that will kill cancer cells without affecting normal cells, as well as on "repurposing" existing drugs that are used for other conditions but might have anti-cancer properties.

A benefit of the latter type of project is cost-effectiveness, said Schimmer. "It costs [a drug] company almost a billion dollars to make new drugs."

One project that he's involved in focuses on the effects of cyproheptadine, which is related to Claritin, the allergy medication.

"We've shown that it kills leukemia cells and shrinks tumours in mouse models," he said. "We don't know if you can achieve the dose needed to produce its anti-tumour effects [in people]. That's actually why you need to do formal studies. You'd need a dose that would far exceed what you need to treat allergies, and we just don't know if that dose is achievable.

"We are looking to repurpose cyproheptadine or other off-patent drugs as new treatments for leukemia and are anticipating a clinical trial within the next one to two years," he said.

For a change of pace from the lab, Schimmer – inspired by birthday parties his children have attended – goes out with his wife and a group of friends for an evening of indoor rock climbing, beach volleyball or trampolining. They are also involved in Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation.

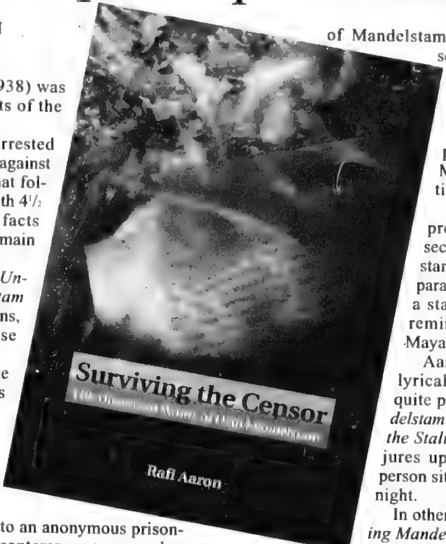
A poetic chart of Soviet poet's persecution

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN



Osip Mandelstam (1891-1938) was one of the major Russian poets of the 20th century.

On May 13, 1934, he was arrested for writing and reciting a poem against Josef Stalin. The persecution that followed was ended only by his death 4½ years later. Some important facts about Mandelstam's last days remain unclear.

Surviving the Censor - The Unspoken Words of Osip Mandelstam by Rafi Aaron (Seraphim Editions, 2006) is a poetic chart of those years.

Poet and scholar Aaron lets the reader experience Mandelstam's life through four distinct voices. Most highly individualized are those of Mandelstam and his wife, Nadezhda, as Aaron endeavours to shed light on their inner life.

The other two voices belong to an anonymous prisoner from the gulag camps, and a contemporary researcher of Mandelstam's life. These voices are somewhat less personal, and give Mandelstam's life historical context and relevance for a present day in which the arbitrary evil of power is far from dead. Mandelstam lived in a dark time, but so do we.

Most of the book is in prose poems. However, one section, "Falling," in Mandelstam's voice, is in alternating paragraphs of poetic prose and a staggered-line form that is reminiscent of Vladimir Mayakovsky's poetic syle.

Aaron's style is stark, yet lyrical. In some poems, he is quite pictorial, as in What Mandelstam Meant to Russians During the Stalin Years, in which he conjures up the image of a fearful person sitting alone by a window at night.

In other poems, such as Translating Mandelstam, instead of painting detailed pictures with words, Aaron uses more transitory images. He can move quickly from one image to another apparently unrelated one, though the sequence as a whole is evocative: "The sudden breaking of glass, winter walking through summer, the parade of exotic animals, colours I have never seen and little fires that warm me here and there."

This tendency to hint at some things, rather than describe them, is a fitting approach to a subject that is still partly obscure.

Eight years ago, Aaron began a literary journey, researching Mandelstam's life and work. In October 2004, that journey took him to St. Petersburg, Russia. There, he delivered the Alexander Mackenzie Memorial Lecture, presenting "Surviving the Censor" to a Russian audience on behalf of Canada.

U.S. politics still butt of Mort Sahl's jokes

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Mort Sahl

Mort Sahl has been making people laugh – and think – for more than 60 years.

The Montreal-born comedian, famous for politically charged humour that broke the mould of standup comics, is performing in his hometown on Oct. 6 and in Toronto the next day.

Sahl, who always appears on stage in a trademark red cardigan with the New York Times in hand, has been termed a revolutionary and iconoclast for tackling American politics head on and developing new forms of comedy that strayed from the standard setup and punch-line delivery.

He is credited with developing on-stage intellectual banter and improvised joke telling.

"I thought the mould was not serving the audience. It was kind of a false premise. Comedy was escapism. You have to confront people with what's going on," Sahl told The CJN.

Sahl's political jabs, most notably of the Warren Commission's investigation of the assassination of former U.S. president John F. Kennedy, were rarely made by comedians in the 1950s and '60s.

He got his start at the legendary hungry i nightclub in California, and said the audience wasn't always on his side in the beginning.

"It was sort of like the Christians versus Hawaiians," he joked. "It was not so great. I didn't know what I was doing, they didn't know what I was doing. Eventually, I found a path."

That path led him to inspire other comedians, such as close friend Woody Allen and talk-show host Jay Leno. Political commentary on late-night talk shows is now widely accepted, but Sahl faced much criticism in earlier decades.

Sahl just celebrated his 80th birthday, but Canadian audiences can expect the same comic of years past.

Sahl said his humour hasn't changed much over time but has become more fluid with experience. "The act is basically about politics and movies and women. All the things you need to get ahead," he joked.

Sahl said the show will probably touch on Canadian politics but usually opens with American politics.

Kirk Douglas discusses good times, bad times and Judaism

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

In entertainment circles, they don't come much more legendary than Kirk Douglas.

This summer, the nonagenarian silver-screen icon, multiple Oscar winner and goodwill ambassador for the U.S. State Department, published his ninth and (he says) last book, Let's Face It: 90 Years of Living, Loving, And Learning.

From the foreward on, where recently deceased friend and former Motion Picture Association of America president, Jack Valenti, dubs Douglas "the last surviving Hollywood global superstar," readers know they're about to catch a glimpse into the mind of a man who has seen and done it all in the entertainment world.

Similar in style to his last memoir, 2003's My Stroke of Luck, a colloquial affair chronicling the actor's rehabilitation from a crippling stroke, Let's Face It is "an audit" of Douglas' life as seen through his experiences.

It reveals a man who played virile characters in such classic films as Spartacus, Ace in the Hole, 20,000 Leagues Under the Sea and other action-adventure vehicles throughout the latter half of the 20th century, coming to grips with his creeping mortality.

"I've become fascinated with the game of death," he writes in an early chapter.

By turns mirthful and morose, the book is a self-homage to the actor's extraordinary life, as he reflects upon the many friends and acquaintances who have died and his many loves throughout the decades.

Along the way, Douglas scatters a myriad of anecdotes about good times and bad shared with other actor friends – Frank Sinatra, John Wayne, Burt Lancaster, Laurence Olivier and Ava Gardner to name a few.

Born Issur Danielovitch Demsky to Russian immigrant parents in 1916 after fleeing the pogroms and settling in Amsterdam, N.Y., Douglas keeps returning to his Jewish roots throughout Let's Face It.

He recounts his conflicted and unresolved feelings for his abusive and distant father, which still sting to this day, and takes pride in his studies with a Los Angeles rabbi in these latter stages of his life.

Citing these two concurrent themes in his life, Douglas told The CJN he hopes the experiences have taught him how to be a better father.

"I have decided that any religion that makes you a better person who cares for other people is the right religion for you… Judaism is the right religion for me," he said.

Though most of his progeny are not Jewish – his first and second wives were both non-Jews – Douglas writes he never cared whether his children and grandchildren understood his need to embrace Judaism.

Despite that, one of his granddaughters insisted on having a bat mitzvah last year.

"I never imposed my Judaism on my kids, but they always respected my Judaism," he said, adding that he's received numerous gifts from them over the years, including menorahs and trees planted in Israel in his honour, among others.

Douglas also notes his concern for the state of today's world, and in a riff of the book's title writes, "Let's face it: the world's a mess," citing the spread of AIDS, numerous wars and the ever-present Israel-Palestine conflict.

He dedicates much time reflecting on the death of his youngest son, Eric, to an overdose of drugs and alcohol in 2004 and the impact it had on him and his wife.

"No matter how much you think about such an event, you are never really prepared," Douglas writes. "I feel guilty that my youngest son lived a life of pain and died before I did. Is it my fault? Did I somehow cause him to choose this path? I will never forget the sound of my shovelful of earth falling on his casket."

Of course, not all is doom and gloom, as Douglas sheps nachas when talking about his surviving sons and grandchildren, giving special attention to famous son Michael and his daughter-in-law, Catherine Zeta-Jones.

Many other tidbits are revealed in Let's Face It for Douglas fans to discover, including his many philanthropic projects and the fact that he's never watched any of his old films.

"I'm always trying to change them. And of course, I can't," he said.

In the end, Douglas has few regrets. Although one more Oscar would have been nice, he said.

"If I had to do it all over again… I would not have turned down the role in Stalag 17. William Holden played it and won an Oscar," Douglas said. "But all in all, I lived a life I wanted to live."

Veteran comic keeps fire burning

"We force everybody to live our lives anyway," he said, mentioning Canadians fighting in Afghanistan as an example.

"It's not as agitated up there," he said about Canada. "America's insane. Everyone's on their Blackberry, everyone's afraid they're going to lose their e-mail and thinks that money is going to save them. They defer to materialism."

He said Canada has not fallen into that materialistic trap to the same degree.

A trailblazer, Sahl was the first performer on the cover of Time magazine and the first non-musician to win a Grammy Award. He also co-hosted the Academy Awards and wrote speeches for three presidents, including Kennedy.

This fall, Sahl is going to be teaching a course called the Revolutionary's Handbook at Claremont McKenna College in Claremont, Calif.

Sahl said he has never "taught consciously.

"I'm looking forward to the kids because that's where I got started."

As final words at the end of the interview, Sahl kept the revolutionary fire burning with a message.

"Tell everybody to put their fists up and keep fighting for what they know is right," he said.

Nazis hoped to destabilize Allied currencies

As reconstructed by Ruzowitzky, Sorowitsch is a talented, resourceful and ruthless figure who earns a livelihood as a counterfeiter of American dollars and fake foreign passports.

He moves in sleazy circles, as a smoke-filled nightclub scene in Berlin attests. Even here, anti-Semitism rears its ugly head. A rough-hewn man refers disparagingly to Jewish business methods, while a flowzy blonde turns away in disgust from Sorowitsch after she intuits that he is Jewish.

Charged with the crime of counterfeiting, he is sent to Mauthausen in 1939. He survives by painting portraits of SS men and murals extolling Nazism. Transferred to Sachsenhausen, he is welcomed by Herzog (Devid Striesow), the Berlin detective who arrested him in the first place and is now an SS officer in charge of recruting inmates for Operation Bernhard.

Although the counterfeiters enjoy certain privileges in their "golden cage," like soft beds and passable food, they realize that they are very expendable and always at the mercy of sadistic SS officers such as Holst (Martin Brambach).

Given the circumstances, the mood of the film is dark and sombre, but there are occasional flashes of Jewish-inflected black humour, as when an inmate cracks a clever joke. "Why isn't God in Auschwitz?" he asks mockingly. "He didn't get through the selection process."

As befits its theme, The Counterfeiters concentrates on their success in duplicating British pound notes and, later, U.S. dollars.

Ruzowitzky achieves dramatic tension by pitting one group of counterfeiters against another. Idealists like Burger (August Diehl) want to sabotage Operation Bernhard so that the Nazis cannot use false currency to finance the war effort. Pragmatists like Sorowitsch, who dismiss Burger's anti-Nazi principles as nonsense, value their lives too much to interfere with Nazi plans.

Thanks to Ruzowitzky and his cast The Counterfeiters moves along at a steady pace, enveloping us in its plot twists and intrigues.

In a film replete with compelling scenes, one of the most remarkable occurs after Sachsenhausen is liberated. The counterfeiters, having been freed, are suddenly called upon to convince their fellow prisoners that they are not Nazi collaborators. Rolling up their sleeves, they display the concentration camp tatoos on their arms.

It is an unforgettable scene in a workmanlike movie.

Israeli film a pleasurable delight

The stoic conductor, a colonel named Tewfiq (Sasson Gabai), stubbornly refuses to contact the Egyptian embassy in Tel Aviv. He instructs Khaled (Saleh Bakri), a ladies' man, to ask for directions to a place called Beit Hatikva, when in fact their real destination is Petah Tikvah.

The bus lets them off in a remote development town in the desert, and at this point, with the musicians utterly stranded, the film takes flight.

The pathos of their plight is highlighted when a boorish local inhabitant drives by and derisively calls Tewfiq a "general" and when his famished men threaten to mutiny unless they are promptly fed.

Tewfiq, played with wondrous restraint by Gabai, brings them to a flyblown cafe. Dina, the wry, kind, playful, sexually charged proprietor (exquisitely portrayed by Ronit Elkabetz), takes the Egyptians under her wing, providing food as well as lodging for the night.

Dina shows Tewfiq around town, and as they converse, he drops his mask, revealing his passion for fishing, admitting a fondness for the singer Chet Baker and talking about the death of his wife. Music, both Arab classical and the George Gershwin standard, Porgy and Bess, also draws them closer.

In a roller skate disco, meanwhile, Khaled helps a shy and awkward Israeli man land a date.

As these developments occur, the band's second-in-command, Simon (Khalifa Natour), who is struggling to finish a clarinet concerto, consoles a man whose marriage has hit troubled waters.

Kolirin handles these interlocking situations with effortless authority, leaving us with the universal message that, notwithstanding our radically different backgrounds, we're ultimately vulnerable human beings in need of warmth, understanding and empathy.

Artist's "storehouses of memory" evoke prewar Poland

They Called Me Mayer July: Painted Memories of a Jewish Childhood in Poland Before the Holocaust by Mayer Kirshenblatt and Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, University of California Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Mayer Kirshenblatt, a Polish Jew who immigrated to Canada in 1934, is that rarity of rarities, a person who launches a new, exciting career at an advanced period in life.

In 1990, when he was 73, he began painting. His subject was the Jewish community in the town of Apt (Opatow) in prewar Poland.

His wife, daughter and son-in-law had for years been urging him to paint. He finally relented. His first drawing was of his mother's kitchen.

Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett and Mayer Kirshenblatt

Since then, Kirshenblatt has made it his mission to portray Apt's long-lost Jewish community on canvas. Kirshenblatt, a Torontonian, is clearly a talented painter, his works having been exhibited in the Jewish Museum in New York and the Koffler Gallery in Toronto.

Kirshenblatt's manifold talents are showcased in a handsome, lavishly illustrated volume, They Called Me Mayer July: Painted Memories of a Jewish Childhood in Poland Before the Holocaust, in which he and his daughter, Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, resurrect Jewish Poland through nostalgic text and vivid paintings.

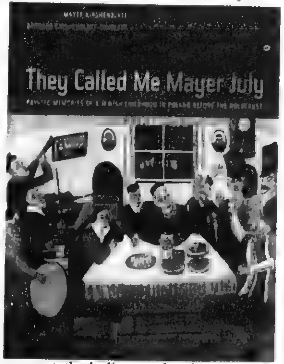
Thanks to this father-and-daughter team, a reader is inexorably drawn into a universe that was obliterated by the Nazis and only really exists in the minds of survivors such as Kirshenblatt.

He draws mainly from memory but also from stories heard from friends and read in Apt's memorial book.

Apt, in southeastern Poland, had a population of nearly 8,000 in 1921, of whom more than 5,000 were Jewish. By 1931, its population had grown to 9,512, of whom 5,436, or 57 per cent, were Jewish. Jews settled in Apt in the 1500s, and at the dawn of the 20th century, it was an important Jewish centre in Poland, having been the home of many famous rabbis.

The majority of its Jewish inhabitants were tradesmen and artisans, concentrated in the manufacture of brushes, clothing and food.

Kirshenblatt's father had a modest store where he sold candy, ice cream and soda water by the glass. Since his shop did not flourish, he opened a leather and shoemaking supply store.



As Kirshenblatt recalls, the wealthiest Jew in town was Layzer Mandelbaum, who owned a big soap factory on the edge of Apt. "The Mandelbaums were completely assimilated," he says. "I don't remember them ever coming to synagogue. If they did, it would have been once a year for Kol Nidrei on the Day of Atonement, the holiest day of the year."

Jews lived all over Apt, but many appear to have dwelled around Jewish Street, or Berek Joselewicz Street, which was named after a Jewish hero who fought with Tadeusz Kociuszko for Polish independence in the 1794 uprising against the Prussians.

Apt's intelligentsia was Polish. In general, Poles worked in various trades, though some were employed in Mandelbaum's factory and as maids in Jewish homes. Polish farmers were better off than most Poles in Apt. "Not only could a farmer feed himself, but he could sell the milk and the butter and cheese he made," Kirshenblatt observes:

He leaves the impression that Apt was quite underdeveloped, like much of Poland. As he writes, "People travelled by horse and wagon."

And Apt had no newspaper of its own. "The papers came from Warsaw. My family did not bother with Polish newspapers. We read the Jewish newspapers in Yiddish."

Three families would typically share newspapers such as Moment and Haynt. "I loved to read the newspaper at the table while I was eating," Kirshenblatt recalls. "But my father would not allow this. He would say, 'You cannot read at the table because you'll stain the paper with food and this paper has to go to the neighbours.'"

Judging by their diet, life was hard. Take this passage, for example: "We lived on potatoes year-round. A Jewish housewife really had to be a gourmet cook to prepare potatoes 52 different ways."

Herring was also a staple. As he puts it, "A woman could make a whole banquet from a herring." He adds, "In Canada, the head of a herring or other fish is discarded. In the Old Country, it was considered a delicacy… reserved for the head of the family."

For a poor family, he elaborates, a few boiled potatoes, bread and a piece of herring constituted "an excellent meal."

Rendered fat, whether from chickens, ducks or geese, was widely used. "Fat was an important item," he notes. "If a woman or man were thin, the person had a hard time attracting a partner. The man or woman was suspected of having a lung disease, like consumption. If the man was heavy, the saying was 'Look at him! What a belly! He must be wealthy!'"

He waxes rhapsodic in describing Apt's Jewish bakers. In a reference to the baker Saul Marmurek, who survived the German occupation and settled in Toronto, he lists in mouthwatering fashion the delicious baked goods the Marmureks mass-produced.

The Sabbath was the highlight of the week, and in Kirshenblatt's hands, the preparations for it are worthy of a passage in a novel: "Mother got up very early Friday morning. After she was done with the cooking and baking, she bathed us in a big wooden laundry tub in the kitchen. The last thing she did was to scrub the kitchen floor."

Given the parlous state of Poland's economy and the prevalence of anti-Semitism, the Kirshenblatts were prime candidates for emigration.

Palestine was the preferred destination, but the British Mandate authorities issued few entry permits. Canada was not easy to get into either. But since they already had blood relatives there who could help them financially, Kirshenblatt's father was able to immigrate to Canada in 1928. His son soon followed. "I just could not see any future in Poland."

Kirshenblatt's first six months in Toronto were very difficult. Yet he managed, eventually earning a livelihood from a paint and wallpaper store and as a house painter.

His paintings, however, have given him the greatest satisfaction. "I feel that [they] expose a whole new world that nobody knows except me, the friends of my youth and people from my town who survived the Holocaust."

Kirshenblatt's charming and playful paintings, which remind me of the American stylist Grandma Moses, are indeed evocative of the 1920s and 1930s, when Poland was home to 3.3 million Jews.

This great community was ruthlessly destroyed by the Nazis in a few short years. In Apt, ghettoization was followed by deportation to death camps.

But thanks to Kirshenblatt's wonderful paintings and his "storehouses of memories," the Jews of Apt will live forever.

Roy Foss Automotive Group
Executive Sales

The Roy Foss Automotive Group, one of Canada's largest and most successful automotive dealers is offering a once in a life time opportunity!

For the right candidate we offer a generous commission program, plus car package and bonus program. If you are working in sales now, stop and ask yourself "5 simple questions"

1. Am I getting enough traffic?
2. Am I being paid what I am worth?
3. Are they giving me the support and respect I deserve?
4. Do I really see a future where I am working now?
5. Do I have the opportunity to lease all makes and models?

If the answer to any of these questions are "No" and you are in automotive sales now, this is the opportunity you have been waiting for. Call to set up a confidential interview and make a real change for the better!

If you have no automotive experience, but if you are great with people and have a proven track record in appliance sales, electronic sales, clothing sales, real-estate sales, insurance, or ex-police officer, this is a great opportunity to take your career to the next level!

For a confidential interview email your resume to:

Israel sinks Serbia to survive in EuroBasket 2007

By MATAN KRAKOW
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GRANADA, Spain — Even after one of the best games of his life, Yaniv Green was characteristically quiet, peaceful and relaxed.

Last week, he led Israel to an 87-83 victory over Serbia in its third and final game of the preliminary round at EuroBasket 2007, helping his team clinch a spot in the next stage and hand Serbia its earliest exit from the tournament in 60 years.

"We had a problem at the beginning believing that we could win this game because of what happened against Russia [a 90-56 loss two days before]," he said softly and slowly. "But in the second half, we showed a lot of determination. Every one gave 100 per cent of himself because we knew that these could be our last 20 minutes together. Now we can continue together for at least a few more days."

Israel, which took control of the game in the third quarter by outscoring Serbia 25-15, was the last squad to reach the European championship.

"In the locker room during halftime, we talked only about defence," said coach Zvi Sherf. "We can't score 90 points every game, but this time good defence in the second half gave us confidence on offence, too."

Israel during the second half was a completely different team. Green finished offensive plays as a trailer, shooting from about halfway out and going to the free-throw line again and again, finishing 10-for-11 from the charity stripe.

Guy Pnini put on a defensive show against Milan Gurovic, who led his team with 19 points but was only 6-of-17 from the field. "The entire team stopped Gurovic, not just me," Pnini said. "Altogether, we played amazing on defence."

Israel ended the preliminary round with a 1-2 record, while Serbia lost its third game. As Yugoslavia, the team won eight gold medals between 1973 and 2001.

"It's all my fault, and I take the full responsibility. I picked the players, so I can't blame them," Serbia coach Zoran Slavnic said.

Russia claimed first place in Group A with a 61-53 victory over Greece.

The top three teams from the four groups move into two groups of six in the qualifying round, with the results from the first round carrying over.

In Palma de Mallorca, Sarunas Jasikevicius steered Lithuania to the top spot in Group C with an 84-80 win over Germany. The 31-year-old former Maccabi Tel Aviv player turned in another inspirational display with 15 points, four rebounds and 10 assists, eclipsing German forward and Dallas Mavericks star Dirk Nowitzki, who notched 28 points and nine rebounds.

Peer's U.S. Open run ends in quarterfinals

By RAMI HIPSH
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Anna Chakvetadze defeated Shahar Peer 6-4, 6-1 in the quarterfinals of the U.S. Open last week. It was the first time an Israeli woman had advanced that far at Flushing Meadows.

"That is the reason why Anna is in the top 10," Peer said. "She has been playing wonderful tennis the last two months."

Peer, who is No. 19 in the WTA singles rankings, opened the match against the sixth-seeded Russian by capitalizing on her opponent's errors to take a 4-2 lead in the first set.

However, Chakvetadze refocused and went on the attack. "I just started playing more aggressively," she said.

Peer lost the next four games and couldn't answer Chakvetadze's strength. Breaking Chakvetadze's serve in the first game of the second set didn't help, as Peer's serve was broken immediately afterward.

At one point in the second set, Peer had triple break point, but she couldn't convert, as her confidence in the match fell.

"I came into the U.S. Open after the worst two months of my career," Peer said after the loss. "I also suffered an injury right before the tournament, and I didn't even know if I would be able to play, so I am satisfied that I reached the quarterfinals, but I am disappointed in the loss, because I beat her just a few months ago [at Indian Wells]. She raised her level of play after 4-4 [in the first set]. She returned many precise shots, and I couldn't find an answer."

The tournament restored Peer's faith in herself.

"I believe that I will eventually break into the top 10," she said. "I don't know when, because I have to continue to work hard and improve a lot of areas of my game, but I believe it will happen."

Peace through soccer?

By ELI ASHKENAZI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — In the hope of giving Palestinian children a better future, Hapoel Tel Aviv will begin operating soccer schools next month in villages outside Nablus.

"The goal is for 2,500 children in five villages to be participating within a year-and-a-half," says Meir Orenstein, the education and social project manager of Hapoel Tel Aviv.

His partner in the project is the United Kibbutz Movement's (UKM) Yoel Marshak.

"We'll try to give the children hope of a better future," Marshak said. "Who knows? Maybe this activity will sow seeds of peace where now there's only enmity."

Several weeks ago, Orenstein asked Marshak, who heads the UKM's special assignments division, to set up contacts with Palestinian village leaders in the Nablus area. Marshak already has ties with these leaders in agricultural assistance projects. The two visited Kafr Salem and met with the local council heads of both Salem and Dir Hateb.

"We intentionally went to remote villages, where conditions are hard – there's no running water there and the pitches where they'll be playing are just gravel surfaces," said Marshak, who considers himself a Beitar Jerusalem fan.

Education, Culture and Sport Minister Raleb Majadele met with Marshak last week, expressing his support for the project. Majadele also called up Palestinian Authority contacts, asking for their support as well.

Orenstein said Palestinian co-ordinators would rum the schools in the villages, employing local coaches to be trained by Hapoel Tel Aviv.

"Each child will receive four weekly hours of sports, tutoring and social activities," he said. "I saw a great thirst for activity during our visited to Salem."

Some 23,000 youth take part in Hapoel Tel Aviv's educational programs across Israel, most of them from outlying areas.

Religious, and happy

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

David Rosmarin recently posed the following question to me: "If you knew, beyond a shadow of doubt, that there was some sort of higher power – call it a God-being – watching over you and making sure your life was a good one, would you be a more or less anxious person?"

I weighed my answer: On one hand, I'd probably feel less anxiety about my life, were I to know for sure that (a) God wanted my life to be a good one and (b) that He was looking out for me, personally, all the time. Then again, assuming both "a" and "b" are true, why the heck is my life – like most lives, I imagine – so imperfect? If God is supposed to be looking out for me, and this is how He's chosen my life to turn out, what gives?

Rosmarin has been asking this same question to a lot of people lately. The query – and, more importantly, how people who suffer from stress, anxiety and depression answer it – is the subject of his doctoral work in clinical psychology at Bowling Green State University in Ohio. He and two professors in BGSU's department of psychology, Kenneth Pargament and Annette Mahoney, recently co-wrote a paper, titled "Religiousness, anxiety, depression and happiness among Jews."

The study of the relationship between religion and psychology is nothing new. Freud, the most well-known of psychologists to the layman, considered the topic in great detail. He thought of religion as a sort of neurosis, associated with repression, delusion, paranoia and helplessness. For Freud, religiosity is an expression of anxiety, and so can only aggravate human symptoms of anxiety.

But more recent research into the relationship between religion and anxiety diverges from Freud. Over the last 30 years, studies have shown that, for the most part, higher degrees of religious observance lead to lower levels of anxiety.

Until now, however, all the evidence of an inverse correlation between religious observance and anxiety, stress and depression has been focused on Christianity.

Rosmarin's work is the first to consider the relationship between Jewish religiousness and anxiety. His study finds a strong link between what he terms "trust in God" and lower levels of anxiety among Orthodox Jews. Similarly, he finds an association between "mistrust in God" and higher levels of anxiety and depression among the same demographic.

So far so good. But what about non-Orthodox Jews? As Rosmarin writes: "Among non-Orthodox Jews, mistrust in God was a consistent predictor of increased anxiety and depression, though trust in God was not a significant predictor of psychological health."

That seems weird – does the mere practice of religion lead to increased mental health, or does mental health depend on the seemingly less significant details of how one practises religion?

Rosmarin's study seems to point to the latter hypothesis — that the manifestation of religious belief, more than the simple belief itself, is a predictor of mental health. If study after study detects a positive relationship between mental health and religiosity, does that mean religious groups who don't fit the results are less religious? Should we be stocking up on straitjackets for the non-Orthodox?

My answer to Rosmarin's question, by the way, is yes. I would, I think, be less anxious, less stressed about life if I believed, beyond a shadow of a doubt, that there was God up there looking out for me, making sure I lived a good life.

Then again, I'm an Orthodox Jew, and Rosmarin's study clearly outlines the benefits that I can expect for believing.

As for all the non-Orthodox Jews out there who also believe in God, what can I say? Apparently, God doesn't like you quite as much – that's why you're all a bunch of mental marshmallows compared to us blissed-out Orthos.

In any case, the non-Orthodox are in trouble whichever way they choose to look at it: either God is just not convinced that they really trust Him, or they all have one hell of an oedipal complex.

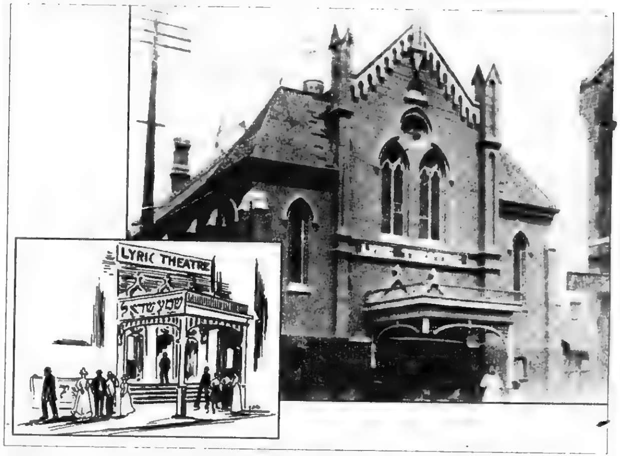
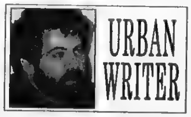
THE LYRIC THEATRE



The former Agnes Street Methodist Church, built in 1870, was sold and converted into Toronto's second Yiddish theatre, the Lyric. It opened in 1909 with a production of the play Shma Yisroel by Osip Dimov, as a magazine illustration from the day attests. The Lyric (later the National) stood at what is now the corner of Bay and Dundas streets, and burned down in 1922.

Awaken, o sleepers!

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG



On the High Holy Days we do a most peculiar thing. We blow a horn, a shofar, a Jewish instrument. I say it's "peculiar," because musical instruments are not generally part of the Jewish treasure chest of rituals (although they were in fact played in the Temple), especially one made from the horn of the ram.

The shofar is a fascinating little thing. I have blown the shofar a number of times over the years, and I delight in the opportunity to do so. I do because, like a blues guitarist playing a haunting melody in a hall, where the lights are low and a collective feeling of introspection and wonderment is prevalent, the moment I wrap myself in a tallit and blow the shrill notes of tekiah, truah, shvarim, a spiritual quiet envelops the shul.

Sometimes I will peak out from underneath my woolen shawl as I blow this Jewish horn and watch as others close their eyes, tilting their head ups at the sound of the tekiah and truah – described in the Mishnah, as the "wavering cry."

The shofar is blown every day during the month of the Elul, the 30 days leading up to the High Holy Days. It is said that Moses ascended Mount Sinai and blew the shofar so that the children of Israel would not fall back into idol worship and forget the important meeting that was happening between God and their leader.

According to the Encyclopedia Judaica, the shofar is considered to be one of the earliest musical instruments known to humankind. According to the American Heritage Dictionary, fourth edition, the word shofar is related to the Akkadian word sapparu, meaning wild sheep, and to the Sumerian word segbar, meaning fallow deer. It is mentioned 69 times in the Torah and regularly in the Talmud.

Anthropologists say the shofar was blown to scare off demons, the Satan and evil spirits, so it is, therefore, appropriate that we blow it on the High Holy Days to frighten away the prosecuting attorney.

The great Jewish philosopher Saadiah Gaon listed 10 reasons we blow the shofar, including to proclaim the sovereignty of God; as a reminder of the Akedah (Abraham's near offering of his son, Isaac), since the ram that was substituted for Isaac was caught in the thickets by the horns; to inspire awe; as a summons to the heavenly court to be judged on the Day of Judgment; and as a reminder that the shofar will call together Israel's scattered remnants to return to Israel.

Maimonides (the Rambam) says that we blow the shofar to, "Awake O sleepers from your sleep, O slumberers arouse ye from your slumber, and examine your deeds, return in repentance and remember your Creator" (Yad Teshuvah 3:4).

On the High Holy Days, listen closely to the blowing of the shofar. Some say it is a crying instrument, each note signifying tears that have rolled down the faces of millions of our people over years of suffering.

That may be, but watch the face of the ba'al tekiah, the shofar blower, once he has completed his task of blowing that little horn.

Frequently, he will express a joyous look, one of great triumph. Could it be that between the cries, he has heard the sounds of happiness emanating from the great accomplishments of our people despite the pogroms, destruction of the Temples and the Holocaust.

Wake up, oh Jews! Wake up all nations!

Learn from the shofar and understand that there have indeed been reasons to cry, then and now, but even more reasons to embrace the bliss and exhilaration that exists around us, within us and within every moment of our existence.

Tekiah, shvarim, truah. Wake up from your slumber and examine your deeds.

A time for renewal

Editorial

These two adorable girls planting the tiny green sprigs of future trees hold Time in their puffy little hands. But, of course, they don't know it. How could they? They are so very young.

They are new life helping to bring forth new life.

They perfectly embody the forward-looking idea, if not also the hope, of renewal that has been the aspiration of every generation since parents first sang lullabies to their children.

Renewal – personal and communal – is the theme of this year's Rosh Hashanah Greetings supplement.

It is not without irony, many readers will undoubtedly observe, that we use an image of toddlery innocence to evoke the weightier, less innocent version of renewal prior to Rosh Hashanah, the Yamim Nora'im and Yom Kippur. For the renewal contemplated at this time of year through the upcoming holy days is that born of lifelong experience, introspection, self-evaluation and possibly repentance. It is a holiday whose liturgical and spiritual essence is aimed directly at the contemplative hearts of adults, not at the guileless imaginations of very young children.

And yet there is a connection.

It is this: young children and "old" adults – ironically – share the same sense of urgency about Time. Children, because they are blissfully unaware of Time's inexorable countdown nature; and old people, because they know it all too well.

As we respond to the shofar, the siren of Rosh Hashanah, and reflect on our lives, we might be wise to do so with the same urgency that is characteristic of both the very young and the very old.

The essays in this supplement are intended to inform and possibly inspire readers about the idea of renewal, about how we might consider renewing aspects of our own lives, about possibly igniting to a higher level of flame, the pilot lights of our respective Jewish identities.

The CJN asked a number of creative thinkers and inexhaustible doers to write about various aspects of renewal.

The subjects include renewing our belief in God; our forms of prayer; and our commitment to community, to the other, to justice, to tikkun olam, to Jewish reading, and even to Zionism.

We hope that you enjoy and find some inspiration in the supplement.

We hope, too, that at some point in the holiday, we all understand the importance of grasping tightly and for urgent purposes – much like the youngsters in the image above planting their future trees – the fleeting tendril that we call Time and that we hold, alas only evanescently, in our hands.

Chag samayach.

Renewing Our belief in God

By RABBI YOEL GLICK

The Jewish New Year is a time of renewal and reaffirmation, when we reassert our commitment to our highest aspirations and ideals. Yet, there is one area of commitment that is often overlooked, and that is the commitment to make God a real and living presence in our lives.

Religion has come to mean so many different things to us – community, identity, social justice, self-fulfilment – that we have forgotten its original meaning, which is "to rejoin" (from the Latin ligare): religion is the path of rejoining ourselves with God.

In Chassidism, the word dvekut is used – a binding or clinging to God. The Ba'al Shem Tov, the founder of the chassidic movement, teaches that all the mitzvot (commandments) have been created in order to help us to join with God. In fact, he states, the outer form of the mitzvah is only a garment or vessel to hold this inner power, which is the life force and essence of the commandment.

The experience of the reality of God is the activating principle that underlies all faiths. It is the inner foundation upon which the outer edifice of the world's religions has been built. The experience of the reality of God is the engine that drives the motor of the spiritual life.

The key to awakening this inner experience is a shift in our consciousness from a narrow, physical way of thinking to an expansive, spiritual manner of seeing and perceiving reality.

We inhabit a physical world and have a physical consciousness. We analyze and concretize everything that we experience. We leave nothing untouched; we experience nothing in its pure state. Everything is reflected through the mirror of our preconceived mental notions and ideals.

We are pulled in every direction by the sensual stimuli that we receive. We are programmed into set modes of perception and behaviour. Through the constant assault of the mass media, new information and opinions permeate our consciousness, without our being aware that this has even occurred.

Rosh Hashanah is about breaking out of these set patterns – this prison of the mind and the emotions – and entering the freedom of our true self. It is about awakening ourselves to full conscious awareness.

The Ba'al Shem teaches that there is a world called shofar gadol – the great ram's horn, which is the natural world of the soul. It is a world of total freedom, a world of infinite expansion, where there are no boundaries or limitations. On Rosh Hashanah, we forge a link with this sublime world and open a door to inner freedom.

Rosh Hashanah is about ... entering the freedom of our true self

The shofar is also sounded to announce the beginning of the yovel – the 50th year, when all slaves are freed from their bondage. When we sound the shofar on Rosh Hashanah, we are freed from our bondage to material consciousness and enter into the liberty of Divine life.

The chassidic master, Rebbe Israel of Karlin, says this is the meaning of the rabbinic teaching that on Rosh Hashanah, we are "written in the Book of Life or Death": "If we hear the shofar of inner freedom on Rosh Hashanah, then 'spiritual livingness' becomes engraved in our heart and mind on this day. But if we are deaf to its call, then we will remain trapped in the slavery of our material consciousness, and 'spiritual death' will be written on the tablet of our soul."

Whatever the consciousness that we experience on Rosh Hashanah, that is the consciousness we take with us into the New Year. That consciousness will become the filter through which we experience reality. It will be the lens through which we view the world.

A transformation in our consciousness

The prayers and rituals of the Yamim Noraim – the Days of Awe that begin on Rosh Hashanah and reach their culmination on Yom Kippur – are structured to create the necessary conditions to stimulate this transformation in our consciousness, a transformation that takes place in a three-stage process.

The first stage in the process is to expand the boundaries of our awareness beyond the narrow view of reality that our physical mind perceives. This change in awareness is facilitated by a powerful influx of expansive ideas, images and experiences on Rosh Hashanah. The central motif of these experiences and images is that God is real and that the spiritual realm – His heavenly kingdom – is a living reality.

A compelling example of this imagery occurs during the service for the reading of the Torah. In the Sephardi version of the Rosh Hashanah service, after the Torah is taken out of the ark, the cantor stands facing the congregation with the Torah scroll in his arms and together with them, he repeats,12 times, the phrase, "Your Word, O Lord, stands forever in the Heavens."

As the whole congregation repeats these words over and over again, it is as if, with this act, we are breaking through the barrier created by our material consciousness and experiencing the reality of the heavens. Through the force of this affirmation, we transcend the temporal truth of this physical world and touch God's eternal "Word."

A second example of the effective use of ideas and imagery to expand our consciousness on Rosh Hashanah is the Musaf or additional service. This service is structured around three major themes: Malchiot (kingship), Zichronot (remembrance) and Shofarot (shofar blasts). These three themes form the basis for a process of inner reflection that is meant to deepen our awareness and lead to the first stirrings of the experience of the Divine realm.

The first theme is Malchiot: God is King.

The universe is not a random event. There is a power behind creation, a unifying presence that infuses all life. There is one God who ties all life together into an interconnected unity of infinite Oneness. We all are part of God, all part of that infinite Oneness.

The central motif of these experiences and images is that God is real

The second theme is Zichronot: God remembers.

The unifying presence that dwells in all life is a conscious force, a higher power that oversees all of creation and remembers everything that has occurred. There is a Divine purpose and a Divine plan that are driving the universe forward toward a place of love and light. We belong to a brotherhood that includes millions of souls on higher planes that comprise the soul of Israel and the soul of humanity. We have a shared source and a shared mission. All are part of God's universal plan.

The third theme is Shofarot: God is calling out to us.

The blowing of the shofar takes the breaking of our material consciousness into the realm of direct experience. It is a blast that shatters our complacency. It is a trumpet call that breaks down the wall between us and our soul. It is an urgent plea that cries out: "God is not in some far off heaven; He is inside each and every one of us. God can be known by anyone. He can be reached at any time. All we have to do is dive deep within our hearts and find the place at the very core of our being where He dwells."

'We get a glimpse of who we are'

Meditating upon these ideas, our thoughts reach out to touch upon a greater reality and a greater vision than what we can experience with our five senses. It broadens our consciousness to include other planes of existence and other worlds inhabited by light-filled souls. It stretches our mind beyond the selfish and shortsighted goals of our personal plans and schemes to visualize a Divine plan that covers vast eons of time and affects myriads of lives.

Contemplating these ideas, we are stimulated to explore beyond our outer personality to find the higher self within. We are driven to look past the concrete facts of accepted knowledge to search for the living truths that are inside us. We are pushed past mere intellectual musings and emotional fantasies to discover real Divine inspiration that will give a higher purpose and meaning to our lives.

Reflecting on the elevating themes of the Musaf service arouses within us a deep desire to know and serve God. It gives us our first glimpse of the Divine reality, which is the fruit of the preliminary stage of our inner awakening. The process of liberating our consciousness from physical bondage and lifting it into the freedom of the world of the shofar gadol now moves on to the second stage.

We are stimulated to explore beyond our outer personality to find the higher self within

On Rosh Hashanah, we get a glimpse of who we really are. Once we have seen our true self, we can no longer continue to maintain the "false image" that is our present identity. Therefore, we commit ourselves to a process of self-transformation and purification during the coming year. All through the 10 days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, we turn to God in prayer and supplication, asking Him to guide us in transforming our personality self into the active embodiment of our Divine self.

On Rosh Hashanah, we get a glimpse of the living God inside each of us. As a result of this revelation, we can no longer bear to cause suffering to another person. We feel compelled to act immediately to relieve the pain and mend the hardship that we have already caused.

Therefore, during the 10 days between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, we go to anyone whom we have offended or hurt, and ask them for forgiveness. And we do not leave them until the breach between us has been repaired.

Seen in this light, the tradition of asking for forgiveness is more than just an act of regret or repentance. It is the expression of our unconditional love for every human being.

This second stage of self-transformation and self-awareness prepares us for the last step in the process of liberating our consciousness that takes place on Yom Kippur. In this final stage, we withdraw from the world and enter into our inner solitude to find the living presence of God that is within.

On Rosh Hashanah, we get a glimpse of the Divine reality by contemplating ideas that will expand our consciousness. On Yom Kippur, we deepen that experience by living as if that higher reality is our only home.

From the Kol Nidre service on Yom Kippur Eve until the Neilah service at the conclusion of the fast, all of our waking time is spent in prayer and contemplation. We put all mundane matters aside and focus our thoughts on the Infinite and the Eternal. We forget about all of our physical and material needs, and consider only that which is good for the well-being of our soul.

On Yom Kippur, we do not eat or drink for the whole of the 25-hour period of the holy day. In the Kabbalah, we are told that the only reason that we need to eat and drink is because we fell from the Garden of Eden. Only on this lower plane of existence do we need to sustain ourselves with the bodies of dead plants and animals. If we were in our rightful state, we would not have to eat or drink at all. Instead, we would be able to receive our nourishment directly from the Divine energy that is all around us.

Inner awakening culminates at end of Yom Kippur

We are told in the Bible that Moses spent 40 days and 40 nights on Mount Sinai without any food or water. We are also told that an angel fed the prophet Elijah in the desert, and that this meal sustained him for 40 days and nights.

The fast on Yom Kippur is an expression of our desire to return to this sublime state, our wish to be so alive with the presence of God that we need no other source of sustenance.

On Yom Kippur, we put aside all outer signs of worldly importance or achievement and contemplate our own insignificance. We do not wear leather or jewelry, and we do not bathe or anoint ourselves with perfume and cologne. We strip away all the external facades that we have created to protect us from the truth that we are only mortal creatures who, as it is says in the prayers, are "like a fragile potsherd, as the grass that withers, as the flower that fades, as a fleeting shadow, as a passing cloud, as the wind that blows, as the floating dust, and as a dream that vanishes."

On Yom Kippur, we live in recognition of the temporal nature of this physical existence. We live with the understanding that all fame is fleeting and all material possessions meaningless – that we take nothing with us when we leave this world.

On Yom Kippur, we accept that life will be ever-changing and our condition never static – that one minute we may be up and the next we may be down. We acknowledge the truth that no matter how hard we work, no matter what talents we possess or what fortune we have amassed, our destiny ultimately rests in the hands of God.

As it is written in the prayers: "Who shall live and who shall die; who shall attain the full measure of man's days and who shall not attain it… who shall rest and who shall go wandering; who shall be tranquil and who shall be disturbed; who shall be at ease and who shall be afflicted; who shall become poor and who shall wax rich; who shall be brought low and who shall be exalted."

On Yom Kippur, we renounce all of our individual plans and ambitions and place ourselves at the service of the Divine plan.

"All the created beings will prostrate themselves before You, and they all will form a single band to carry out Your will with a perfect heart."

On Yom Kippur, we relinquish all illusions of personal grandeur and rest in the knowledge that the Lord has created and is guiding the world.

"May everything that has been made know that You have made it; everything that has been created understand that You have created it; and everyone who has the breath [of life] in his nostrils declare that the Lord, God of Israel, is King and His Kingship has dominion over all."

On Yom Kippur, we acknowledge that our little wills mean nothing. We acknowledge that it is only when the will of God is behind an endeavour that it will have any lasting effect. For when the energy of God's goodness flows into a situation, there is nothing that can stand in its way.

As it is written in the prayers: "Injustice will shut its mouth and all wickedness will go up in smoke, when You will remove the rule of evil from the earth."

On Yom Kippur, during the Avodah service to commemorate the worship in the Temple, we bow down to God with the whole of our being – falling flat on our face before the Lord. This full prostration is symbolic of our total surrender – the dedication of our heart, mind and soul to Divine service. On Yom Kippur, we are filled with such an intense love for God that we want to make an offering of ourselves to Him.

This whole process of inner awakening comes to its culmination at the end of Yom Kippur, when the entire congregation chants out loud the first line of the Shema: "Hear O Israel, the Lord is Our God, the Lord is One;" the phrase: "Blessed be the Glory of His kingdom forever and ever"; and the affirmation: "The Lord, He is God," which is repeated seven times. Then, the shofar is blown for a last time, ending with a long ascending blast.

This year, as we chant the Shema, let us strive to experience that great Oneness that encompasses all, gives life to all and is the true home of all.

As we proclaim the glory of His kingdom, let us abide in the expansive plane of consciousness that the Ba'al Shem calls the world of the shofar gadol.

As we affirm the words "the Lord, He is God," let us renew our commitment to fill our life with purpose and meaning.

As we listen to the sound of the shofar, let us hear the cry of the spirit for the breath of Divine life.

Renewing Prayer

By RABBI
MARTIN LOCKSHIN

Prayer may be a very personal matter, but Judaism has always seen it as a communal activity, too. Synagogue attendance is one of the standard ways of measuring commitment to Judaism – particularly in the Diaspora. But synagogue attendance rates appear to be receding from year to year, and Jews wonder what this bodes for our future. We are, thankfully, witnesses today to some creative ways to revitalize and renew Jewish liturgy. What is surprising is that this creativity is not limited to the more liberal branches of Judaism. Orthodoxy, too, is experiencing its own forms of renewal in prayer.

One of the central concepts of Jewish prayer is that it provides us with a connection to our past. There is something very moving about the thought that when we recite a prayer such as "Hear O Israel," we are joining ourselves to a chain of Jews who have prayed that way for thousands of years. The talmudic rabbis realized the value of that historical link when they spoke out strongly against those who change the wording of prayers.

Despite the rabbis' injunction, Jewish prayer has hardly been static over the years. Over the centuries, liturgical poets added many prayers to the service when circumstances seemed appropriate. The style, format and melody of the synagogue service have changed, as has the architecture and layout of the buildings in which people pray, and even the way that people dress when they go to synagogue. Thus, the experience for a Jew praying in a synagogue in Poland in the 18th century was very different from that of a Jew in Spain in the 11th century.

In pre-modern times, these changes probably did not result from conscious decisions of rabbis or lay people to try to attract more Jews to synagogue. But in the last two or three centuries, the consciousness of intentional change has been stronger and the pace of change has been faster.

The first and strongest impetus for planned change in synagogue prayer came from the Reform movement. The minutes of the meetings of early Reform rabbis spell out their fears that services with too much Hebrew or with too long a Torah reading were inappropriate in 19th-century western Europe – they would not appeal to members of their communities. Since then, non-Orthodox Jews have continued to make conscious, calculated changes to the liturgy and to the synagogue. For an idea of the range of current and past Reform opinions, see Rabbi Richard Sarason's fascinating discussion (http://urj.org/Articles/index.cfm?id=10572) of the ways Reform rabbis have debated whether to use the traditional text of the Shema prayer, or an edited version that removes parts whose theology "to the modern scientific mind… seemed rather primitive and gross." Reform prayer books today – and, to a lesser degree, Conservative prayer books, too – offer a veritable smorgasbord of readings and prayers for individuals and congregations to use in their local services.

Jewish prayer has hardly been static over the years

The reaction of most Orthodox Jews to conscious changes in the structure of the synagogue experience was consistently negative throughout the 19th century and most of the 20th. Today, the situation seems to have changed. Orthodox Judaism still eschews the possibility of changes in Halachah (Jewish law). This precludes the possibility of changing the wording of prayers or deleting prayers that some might see as insufficiently modern or progressive. But all denominations today make attempts to restructure and repackage the synagogue experience in order to attract more Jews.

Changes in musical style are one feature of the movement towards renewing synagogue services. One of the hottest and most interesting synagogues today is B'nai Jeshurun in Manhattan, a synagogue with both Conservative- and Reform-trained rabbis and a very unorthodox style. Its membership has blossomed from 100 households in 1985 to around 2,000 today. Many otherwise uninvolved upwardly mobile young urban professional Jews drop in at BJ straight from work on Friday for a spiritual experience to begin their weekend.

According to the report of a recent Friday evening visitor, the service has a pop band with guitars, electric keyboards, Middle Eastern drum, cello and mandolin. Participants sit in a circle around the rabbi and the band. The worshippers "stand, sing lustily, rock back and forth, and move as the spirit moves them. At one point they join hands and start dancing around the room, they're just that blissed out." (http://fearnotthegods.blogspot.com/2007/01/stage-lighting-lion-of-judah-and-bar.html)

'Inclusion of women the greatest challenge for synagogues'

It goes without saying that musical instruments are not to be found in Orthodox Sabbath services, as their use is understood as violating Sabbath laws. But over the last few decades, the Orthodox world has seen the proliferation of what some call "happy minyanim" – services that are based on the music of Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach and that often involve ecstatic congregational singing and dancing.

"Reb Shlomo" ironically turned into an Orthodox cult hero mostly after his death in 1994. During his lifetime, he was a man of controversy – often criticized by other rabbis and also by feminists – though no one could deny his musical and spiritual gifts. Today, his heritage lives on in many Orthodox (and some non-Orthodox) synagogues in Canada, the United States and Israel.

Many religious Jews will gladly stay in synagogue twice as long for Carlebach-style services that they feel meet their spiritual needs. As one Orthodox rabbi recently explained to me, Carlebach-style services are popular because they "express 'happy Jewish' as opposed to a Judaism based on obligation. People will go to shul if it is enjoyable and engaging, whereas you and I will go to shul whether it is enjoyable or not."

Another method that has been used to renew people's commitment to prayer is changing the content of the service to something ostensibly more relevant. As noted above, in theory, changing the liturgy is unacceptable to Orthodox Jews who are bound by Halachah. But even here some Orthodox synagogues have found a way of working around the restriction.

Some Orthodox synagogues – particularly those interested in "outreach" – have begun using the model of "learners' services." In some cases, this simply means that the rabbi makes explanatory comments during the service in order to guide newcomers. But sometimes it means that no attempt is made to recite the standard liturgy – the "service" is basically a text-study session, sometimes based on one of the prayers and sometimes not. A "straight" service may be occasionally interrupted by an announcement offering a choice between staying in the sanctuary for the full service or leaving to join a study session in a different room.

Amazing advances and changes in Orthodoxy in the last few years

One rabbi admitted to me that offering such a choice allows him to get around another problem: while Halachah requires him to separate men and women at prayer, he knows that some of the young couples who come to his outreach service really want to sit together. He lets the word reach these couples that if they opt for the study option, they can sit beside each other.

And this problem – the inclusion of women – may represent the greatest challenge for synagogues that are attempting to renew themselves. Canada is an egalitarian country: the workforce and society at large take the egalitarian approach as a given. Yet any student of Jewish law knows that the traditional texts do not support an egalitarian approach to prayer. Synagogues were never egalitarian, as far as we know, during any stage of Jewish history. Far from being allowed to lead services, in some periods, particularly medieval times, some synagogues were built in such a way as not to allow any woman to attend services.

While I know that many Jews are frustrated by what they perceive as the slow pace of change on this issue, I am actually astounded at how quickly changes are taking place today. Reform Judaism has adopted a full egalitarian approach. Much of Conservative Judaism in the United States has also adopted full egalitarianism, although here in Canada – particularly in Toronto, where the Conservative movement has a stronger commitment to tradition – the pace of change has been significantly slower.

And what about Orthodox Judaism? Prayer aside, there have been amazing advances and changes in Orthodoxy in the last few years, expanding women's participation in roles traditionally reserved for males. For the first time in history, first-rate women scholars of Talmud and rabbinic texts are graduating from Orthodox institutions, some of which train and certify those women as experts in Jewish law, authorized to provide halachic guidance to both women and men.

Those who understand the basic structure of traditional Judaism realize that this change – the creation of a class of women who have vast knowledge and credentials in rabbinic texts – might be more significant than any changes inside the synagogue. Power in traditional Judaism was historically not in the hands of those who led synagogue services, but in the hands of those who solved halachic problems. Admittedly, this distinction is of little comfort to the individual woman who might feel excluded inside the synagogue that she attends.

It may be too early to judge its significance, but a fascinating and controversial development is now occurring in Orthodox synagogue life – the proliferation of "partnership minyanim." A partnership minyan is a prayer group that is committed both to maintaining halachic standards and to the inclusion of women in ritual leadership roles to the fullest extent possible within a relatively liberal understanding of the boundaries of Jewish law. At a partnership minyan, women and men are separated by a mechitzah. But women have public roles in the service: among other things, they read the Torah and are called up to the Torah for an aliyah.

'Partnership minyanyim' — a new movement

This movement was created a mere six years ago, resulting from an article in the Edah Journal written by Rabbi Mendel Shapiro, an American-trained Orthodox rabbi in Jerusalem. Some of Rabbi Shapiro's technical halachic argumentation is crucial for understanding the current controversy. (The full text of his historic article can be found at http://www.jofa.org/pdf/uploaded/907-NPMN0726.pdf.)

The argument centres around the talmudic passage in Megillah 23a: "All may be called up among the seven [who are called to the Torah on Sabbath morning,] even a minor, even a woman. But the rabbis [later?] said 'A woman should not read the Torah because of the dignity of the community [kevod hatzivbur].' "

Over the centuries, much was written about this short text. In the most straightforward reading, it seems to say that at some time in history, women were called to the Torah, but at a later point, the practice was stopped. The talmudic text does not explain how calling women to the Torah might constitute an affront to the dignity of the congregation or the community. Talmudic commentaries do not help, as they offer more than one explanation of what "the dignity of the community" means.

Rabbi Daniel Sperber: No halachic barrier to Torah reading by women at a service of men and women

Rabbi Shapiro's article surveyed other texts where the concept of the "dignity of the community" appears, and he demonstrated that rabbis over the years recognized that different communities had different understandings of what constitutes their dignity. Some of the greatest halachic decisors have recognized the right of communities to define or to redefine their perception of their own dignity. Accordingly, if a community feels that having women read the Torah would not reduce (and might even enhance) their dignity, then they have the right to do so.

Rabbi Shapiro's article elicited much reaction. Some criticized it sharply. Others offered more measured criticism. Tradition magazine, the leading publication of Modern Orthodoxy, refused to publish Rabbi Shapiro's article six years ago, ostensibly because the issue of aliyot for women was not of interest to their readership. Curiously the interests of Tradition readers must have changed sufficiently in the last six years to justify the publication of a (generally respectful) rejoinder to Rabbi Shapiro in 2007. Another respectful rejoinder by Rabbi Yehuda Herzl Henkin, a talmudic scholar with a world-class reputation, essentially argued that almost all of Rabbi Shapiro's arguments were well-founded, but that his conclusion was outside of the halachic "consensus." (The full text of Rabbi Henkin's article may be found at http://www.jofa.org/pdf/uploaded/908-RODV8998.pdf.)

But now in the summer of 2007, another Orthodox rabbi, Rabbi Daniel Sperber, has published an entire book (Darkah shel halakhah: keri'at nashim ba-Torah, perakim bimediniut pesikah [Reuben Mass: Jerusalem, 2007]) dedicated to analysis of the issue, with the conclusion that there is no halachic barrier to Torah reading by women at a service of men and women. Rabbi Sperber salutes Rabbi Shapiro's pioneering work and builds on it. But in many ways, Rabbi Sperber's support for this Orthodox innovation goes far beyond Rabbi Shapiro's.

First, some halachic naysayers dismissed Rabbi Shapiro's work because it was written in English, not the standard language for halachic discourse. Rabbi Sperber's book is in Hebrew. (Rumour has it that an English translation is being prepared.) Furthermore, though any objective reader looking at Rabbi Shapiro's work immediately recognizes the depth of his understanding of complex rabbinic texts and concepts, still Rabbi Shapiro was essentially unknown in the world of rabbinic scholarship before he wrote his trail-blazing essay.

Not so Rabbi Sperber. He was the author of dozens of books on the history of halachah before he published Darkah shel halakhah. His eight-volume set Minhagei Yisrael is the acknowledged reference work on the history and development of "custom" in Jewish law. Rabbi Sperber, a professor at Bar Ilan University, won the coveted Israel Prize in Jewish Studies in 1992. He has been an honoured guest speaker in Orthodox synagogues around the world, and his books are found in most good Torah libraries. His view on the issue will be much more difficult to dismiss.

Moreover, a careful reading of both works shows that Rabbi Sperber's position is much more challenging to the status quo. Rabbi Shapiro had essentially argued that if some new congregation decided to constitute itself with a new definition of its "congregational dignity," they would not be transgressing Jewish law.

‘Communal dignity’ or ‘human dignity’

But according to Rabbi Sperber’s book, the not-very-well-defined halachic concept of “communal dignity” is today now in conflict with another crucial halachic principle “human dignity” (kevod habriot). Rabbi Sperber argues that: (1) “human dignity” has traditionally been one of the factors considered when deciding the halachic permissibility of various activities; (2) halachic texts recognize that the concept of “human dignity” can and does change over time; (3) today, denying women the opportunity to read the Torah when they want to do so is an affront to their “human dignity”; (4) there is no contest: “human dignity” always trumps “communal dignity” in halachic decision-making; and (5) no one should say that allowing women to read Torah is placing a non-Jewish value, feminism, above Judaism. Rather those who give aliyot to women are showing more loyalty to the halachic value of “human dignity.”

Shirah Hadashah Shabbat services standing room only

As Rabbi Sperber’s book has been in print only since June or July, it is hard to gauge what impact it will have. But it is astounding to note that Rabbi Shapiro’s article just six years ago has already led to the establishment of some 20 “partnership minyanim” around the world. (A list can be found at: http://www.jofa.org/about.php/resources/partnershipm.) Some are more successful than others. But Shabbat services at the flagship minyan of the partnership movement, Shirah Hadashah in Jerusalem (around the corner from Rabbi Shapiro’s home, and not too far from Rabbi Sperber’s), are standing room only. Its 300 seats fill up within minutes of the start of the service. Interestingly, Shirah Hadashah in Jerusalem and many other partnership minyanim around the world combine innovation in the field of women’s participation with the spiritual tunes of Rabbi Carlebach, and with added emphasis on the spiritual experience of prayer.

Let us hope (and pray!) that the efforts in all movements to renew and rejuvenate prayer services will lead to added commitment and spiritual growth for our people in 5768 and beyond.

Renewing Jewish family life

By SCOTT A. SHAY

Is the Canadian Jewish community built on a foundation that will make it a growing and vibrant part of the Diaspora in the coming decades?

The truth is that we do not know the answer to the question.

Currently, it is the fourth largest Diaspora community in the world and is doing very well. Canadian Jewry is diverse, bringing together Holocaust survivors, Sephardim, third- and fourth-generation Jews from the Pale of Settlement, recent immigrants from the Former Soviet Union and many other communities, and offers Jewish families a myriad of possibilities in education and cultural activities. Canadian Jews are successful in all areas of Canadian life, and Canadian Jews have also made it financially.

Yet, unlike Jewish communities elsewhere in the Diaspora, where large immigration took place in the late 19th century, Canadian Jewry experienced continued immigration throughout the 20th century. In 1914, the Canadian Jewish community was less than a third the size it is today. Large demographic growth in the Canadian Jewish community took place in the postwar period.

According to Canadian census data about 40 per cent of Canadian Jews in 2001 were born outside of Canada. This is a high percentage of immigrants in comparison to other Diaspora communities, such as the United States and England. With so many Jews coming from abroad, it is fair to say that Canadian Jewry's ability to maintain Jewish community and identity has not yet been truly tested.

Therefore, the more precise question is whether Canadian Jewry will be able to flourish in the 21st century now that immigration is ending? In my view the answer to the question depends largely on whether Canadian Jewry can implement practical community-wide changes to strengthen Jewish education and Jewish family life.

While the Canadian Jewish community is still doing far better than other Diaspora communities overall with regard to their level of Jewish commitment, intermarriage rates, day school attendance, trips to Israel, and donations to Jewish causes, there have also been worrying signs that Canadian Jewry is now developing some of the problems that communities across the border and across the pond have been facing for the past 25 years.

Current demographic data on Canadian Jewry shows that the Jewish community is older than other immigrant groups, growing less than 20 years ago, and less than other religious groups in Canada. This information suggests that Canadian Jews are marrying later, having children later, and having fewer children than their parents.

Indeed, without immigration in the 1990s from the former Soviet Union, Latin American, Israel and South America, the Canadian Jewish population might have shrunk from 1990 to 2000. Also, similar to the United States and the United Kingdom, intermarriage rates have risen in the past 20 years: the intermarriage rate among Canadian Jews under 30 is 37.3 per cent, more than double the intermarriage rate of Canadian Jews over 39. In some communities, such as Ottawa and Vancouver, 70 per cent of Jews under the age of 30 are intermarried. Canadian Jewish education is also being challenged.

While many non-Orthodox also attend Jewish day schools in Canada, about 20 per cent are leaving after primary school. Further, an alarming number of young Canadian Jews, from 30 to 70 per cent, depending on the community, are receiving neither day school nor Hebrew school education and almost a third of Jewish adults in Toronto and Montreal are unaffiliated; the numbers are probably higher in other communities.

Canadian Jewry cannot ignore these worrisome trends. It must take practical steps to address these issues now in order to ensure a bright future for the good of Canadian Jews, Canada, and Jews around the world.

‘Parents should start talking to their teenagers’

Canadian Jews, like American and British Jews, are increasingly delaying marriage or not marrying at all. Canadian Jewish parents, rabbis and educators need to change this pattern by encouraging young Jews to marry earlier for their own personal benefit and for the benefit of the community as a whole. In the 25-to-44 age cohort, 27.8 per cent of Jews are single and have never married compared to 6.9 per cent in the 45 to 65 cohort.

(For further information on the demographic situation of Canadian Jewry, I highly recommend the analyses of Charles Shahar who has carefully deciphered the Canadian census data as it relates to Jewry.)

Extending Jewish adolescence and pushing back the age of marriage has no discernible benefits and often creates emotional complication for young men and women. By the time a young Jewish man or woman turns 30, he or she has dated or had friendly relationships with so many people that it becomes harder and harder for them to decide who is “right.” Others have had long-term relationships without a clear view to getting married, which also leads to emotional issues and may further delay marriage to the right person. There is simply no proof that putting off marriage for whatever reason makes people happier.

Late marriage also creates additional personal distress for couples who want to have children due to complications with pregnancy after 35. It also contributes to the current decline in the Canadian Jewish birthrate.

Yet, despite the negative emotional and community impact of late marriage, current demographic trends suggest that many Canadian Jewish parents and community members are either passively or actively re-inforcing the general societal pressures to keep a “clear head” while finishing graduate school or achieving early career success, and/or sanctioning an extended adolescence, casual dating or pre-marital long-term relationships with the view that this will help individuals to find the right partner eventually. Other parents may be wary of addressing personal issues such as marriage with their children out of fear of infringing on their children’s privacy and personal freedom. This must stop.

Canadian Jewish population is proportionally older than other ethnic groups

Parents should start talking to their teenagers and teenage boys, in particular, about the single most important decision their children will make: finding a soul mate. Community leaders, rabbis and parents must also warn young women and men of the emotional complications that arise from extending adolescence, dating aimlessly, or getting into long-term relationships without the prospect of marriage and encourage young Jews to marry any time after college if they find the right person. These initiatives would do wonders for the emotional well-being of young Canadian Jews and the future of the Canadian Jewish community.

Canadian Jews have too few children to sustain the current Canadian Jewish population: this too must change. While we do not know the current birthrate among Canadian Jews, we know that the Canadian Jewish population is proportionally older than other ethnic groups and children constitute one-fifth of the Jewish population, whereas in other ethnic communities they make up a third. As in America and Britain, the cultural norm for non-Orthodox Jews in Canada seems to be two children per family. If the current birthrate stays the same, Jews will be the only non-Christian group that will not increase its share of the total Canadian population in the next 10 years. In order to increase the current birthrate, the Canadian Jewish community as a whole must change the current cultural norm and send the message “the more children, the better” in a number of ways.

First, it can re-orient wedding planning and ceremonies toward preparing young couples for starting a family. Such a move is not only much needed but is entirely consistent with Jewish tradition. A key part of the Jewish marriage ceremony is kiddushin. Kiddushin is most often translated as “making holy,” but the word also has the meaning of “dedication” or “devotion.” To make holy is indeed to set aside (dedicate, devote) some time, action or object to a sacred purpose.

‘Strengthen education’

As a preparation for kiddushin, it is appropriate for the rabbis involved and the parents to speak to the couple about the joys of having children, to ask them what kind of life they envision for themselves and their children, and to encourage them to imagine how their lives and the lives of their children can contribute to the Jewish people and the world. This is also an appropriate message to think about during the upcoming High Holy Days.

Second, synagogues and other Jewish cultural groups should offer child care during adult programming or meetings. Third, day schools, Hebrew schools, and camps should also offer discounts for parents who enrol more than one child into their programs. Fourth, rabbis, teachers, lay leaders, parents, and grandparents must all work to make Jewish life much more family friendly by offering additional support for young families.

Canadian Jews need to send the message that family is important, that children are a precious gift, that we need larger families and combine multiple initiatives to change the current cultural norm. With immigration waning, Canadian Jewry needs a baby boom.

Canadian Jewry also needs to strengthen Jewish day school education. While the percentage of Canadian Jewish children in day schools is certainly impressive, reaching as high as 56.2 per cent in Montreal, there is a clear drop off in high school. Currently, 15 to 25 per cent of Canadian day school children are leaving day school after primary school. In some communities such as Vancouver, the percentage of children leaving day school is even higher. This trend is worrisome since the number of years a child attends day school has a greater impact on adult Jewish involvement and in-marriage than any other variable, including being raised in an Orthodox home.

Communities across Canada should focus on bolstering their retention and enrolments at the high school level. In order to do this, they should conduct survey research and speak to local community members to address local needs across the country, be they distance, concern about the curriculum, or price, and address these issues accordingly. Canadian day school education is still going strong, but it is up to the community to keep the ball rolling and keep children in day schools, and increase enrolment at all levels.

An alarming proportion of Canadian Jewish children receive neither day school nor supplementary school education of any kind. Depending on the community, anywhere from 40 to 69 per cent of school-age Canadian Jews received no formal Jewish education in 2001. Indeed, only half of Jewish children across the five largest Jewish communities in Canada receive any exposure to Jewish education. These Jews are far less likely to marry Jewish or to engage in Jewish learning and community life as adults.

Alarming proportion of children receive neither day school nor supplementary school education of any kind

It is essential that the Canadian Jewish community reach out to these young adults with free Israel programs such birthright israel, which succeed in attracting unaffiliated Jews and provide an entry point for a greater long-term connection with the Jewish people. Birthright israel succeeds because of the enthusiasm, passion and energy it generates. The notion that the trip is a gift from the Jewish people adds a sense of gratitude that begets a spirit of camaraderie, openness and goodwill. In addition, the tight programming and intensity of the trip compounds the excitement of the birthright concept.

Birthright israel trips can have a tremendous impact on young Jews: they significantly increase participants’ desire to in-marry and have Jewish children. Moreover, the participants’ propensity toward inmarriage grows rather than fades over time as they leave Israel with the desire to “do Jewish” more often. Thus, trips to Israel draw young Jews into Jewish life and result in more Jews marrying Jews.

In my book about American Jewish renewal, Getting Our Groove Back: How to Energize American Jewry, I suggest that the North American Jewish community create an Israel voucher that would cover either birthright or longer programs to give young Jewish adults as many options as possible. This voucher would also be suitable for Canadian Jews.

'An excellent opportunity to fulfil communal purpose'

The Israel voucher would function as follows: at age 16, Jewish teenagers would be issued a non-transferable voucher for either $2,000 of credit for an approved trip to Israel or a free birthright israel trip. This could be the new Jewish "sweet sixteen" for both sexes. The birthright israel trip could be taken only after the recipient turned 18. The $2,000 credit voucher, which is somewhat below the cost of a free birthright israel trip, could be used during high school or college to defer the cost for an approved four- to eight-week summer trip or applied toward a semester/junior year abroad in Israel. The voucher would expire upon the recipients' 25th birthday.

Canadian Jewry could offer this option to ensure that not only as many young Canadian Jews as possible are getting the chance to go to Israel but also to ensure that it is reaching out to young Canadian Jews without any formal Jewish education.

Canadian Jewry must also reach out to adult Jews and increase adult Jewish education. While the majority of Canadian Jews describe themselves both as Jews by religion and Jews by ethnicity, a third of Canadian Jews are unaffiliated and the number is higher in many local communities. The Canadian Jewish community needs to reach out to these Jews though adult Jewish education, cultural and social programs that suit a broad spectrum of needs and interests.

Increasing adult education not only benefits adult Jews but also strengthens their children's Jewish education. Uncommitted parents who subcontract Jewish education to day schools or Hebrew schools undermine their children's Jewish education and the potential richness of their family life.

Canadian Jewish adult education has grown in creative ways in the past two decades, be it women's education, non-denominational adult learning programs, Orthodox education programs or liberal Jewish education. Canadian Jews should continue to expand these efforts by bolstering current institutions, and building new ones in communities that do not yet have them.

The most effective teacher is the one who teaches by example

Jewish community groups can attract politically, socially, and culturally minded Jewish college students who may not automatically gravitate toward Jewish extra-curricular activities by offering a variety of programs on Jewish ethical teachings, Jewish perspectives on current events, Jewish history, and Jewish cultural life across the world today. Hillels and other Jewish campus organizations should also continue in their efforts to build more facilities and options for young Jews to socialize and learn together.

The community can also reach out to unaffiliated adult Jews through local cultural and social programs. In order to ease this task, local federations can sponsor surveys and research to help local boards of education address the particular needs and interests of unaffiliated adult Jews in their community.

If Canadian Jews can strengthen day school enrolment in the high school, Israel trips, and adult Jewish education they will build the foundation for a vibrant community in the 21st century.

The practical steps I have stated above are not out of financial reach. Canadian Jews have enough wealth to fund these initiatives. Canadian Jews are among the most generous donors to universities and hospitals. If such generous donors were to give even 50 per cent of their donations to Jewish causes, these efforts would certainly be enough to fund the programs I outlined above. Canadian Jews should encourage larger Jewish donations within the community by recognizing these donors on a community wide basis.

Canadian Jewry currently has an excellent opportunity to fulfil its communal purpose in the Diaspora in the 21st century. While we Jews in the English-speaking world have a lot to be grateful for, we can give back best by being a strong Jewish community.

The job of any Diaspora community is to be a light unto the nations. When Jews in the Diaspora, model Jewish traditions in everyday life such as being righteous in business, showing compassion and care in interpersonal relations, we teach others to do the same.

As everyone knows, the most effective teacher is the one who teaches by example. If Canadian Jewry takes the necessary practical steps to strengthen Jewish family life and education today, it will continue to flourish and shine brightly in Canada and the world.

Renewing Modern Jewish life

By GIL TROY

In a world filled with fanatics threatening Jewish survival, we must do all we can to guarantee that Jews thrive, not just survive. We can ensure a Jewish future only by maintaining a high quality of Jewish life, making our community the best it can be. We have the power to shape the Jewish community of tomorrow. We must make modern Jewish life inviting, exciting, enlightening and meaningful.

We all know that growing up in the 21st century, our children and young adults face unique challenges, that this brave new world of the iPod and the Internet – amid its wonders – threatens traditional forms of Jewish identity and expression. We all understand that first-class Jewish educational and cultural experiences provide essential first steps in any Jewish journey. Most of us recognize that the modern Jewish community needs to be more attractive, welcoming, fluid and creative. And we all should admit that former McGill University Principal Bernard Shapiro's recent report is right on the money: we have underfunded most of our Jewish educational institutions and without a massive recommitment to Jewish education and identity-building, our flagship institutions – and our community – risk sliding into mediocrity.

Already, an honest, self-critical look would find many if not most Jews disinterested, unaffiliated, and frequently alienated from the Jewish community. The fate of our children – and grandchildren – is in our hands.

Our community is at a crossroads. Canadian Jews do not need a crystal ball to see what challenges will soon arise. Looking south toward the American Jewish community shows us what will happen if assimilation and apathy continue unchecked without bold, creative and proactive action. There, we see millions of Jews opting out, choosing not to be involved, not to marry Jewish spouses, not to build Jewish families, not to give to Jewish causes, not to find meaning in their lives through a Jewish framework. Although the American Jewish community has many vital organizations, there is too much redundancy, too many inert bureaucracies, too many corners of the community where inertia or mediocrity fester. The result: too many Jews who are turned off and not turned on, and too many Jews who fall through the communal cracks. We see a community with defining, world-class institutions, from New York's 92nd Street Y to Washington's Holocaust Museum; we see American Jews "making it" on Wall Street, in Hollywood, and on Capitol Hill, and yet we see a community in crisis, worried about its future, distressed about its youth.

Fortunately, the American Jewish community has had its wake-up call. For the last decade, led by philanthropic visionaries such as Charles Bronfman, the late Andrea Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt, the community has invested hundreds of millions of dollars in identity-building, especially in the Israel Experience – notably birthright israel – and in Jewish day schools, Jewish camps, Jewish cultural centres, Jewish family educators and Jewish adult learning, Jewish "inreach" and Jewish "outreach."

These "continuity" projects have appealed to hundreds of thousands of Jews, especially the young and unaffiliated, inviting them to find a way back into their community and their tradition. These initiatives have launched hundreds of thousands of new Jewish journeys, each with its own unique individualized flavour, as befits the modern age.

These renewed Jews have discovered that modern Jewish life is about voyages of discovery, not guilt trips; about questioning, not following; about finding new meanings in tradition, not enduring empty rituals; about blazing their own unique paths, guided by the wisdom of the sages, not marching to the beat of some old and foreign drummer.

Throughout North America and Israel you can see, hear, taste and feel the rejuvenated Judaism, sometimes bopping to a chassidic beat and sometimes to a Springsteen tune; sometimes rooted in classical learning and sometimes enjoying a timeless family meal; sometimes Jon Stewart hip and sometimes Martha Stewart traditional.

Federations throughout North America must take the lead in generating positive Jewish experiences in their own communities and building Jewish identity for the next generation. Such a massive and ambitious reorientation and dramatic commitment is long overdue – and is often spurred in communities by "next generation" leaders in their 40s or 50s who as parents feel the challenges facing today's youth most intensely.

'We must regroup and reach out'

Our community is changing, our demographics are shifting, and many institutions need renewing. Just as decades ago the synagogues, schools and Jewish communal offices frequently moved away from downtown and toward the suburbs, we must regroup and reach out to renew, learning what the modern Jewish consumer needs – and deserves – from a growing, inviting and dynamic community.

Visionary federation leaders understand that if we don't work on building a positive Jewish identity and guaranteeing our community's future, nobody else will. And with fewer Jews belonging to synagogues or identifying with one denomination or another, the federations – as central addresses of the Jewish community – have become the headquarters for engineering the Jewish future. With this dramatic shift of priorities has come a greater investment by donors in programming and tuition assistance rather than new buildings. Edifices we have – it's excited customers that we need. The Jewish infrastructure – the "hardware" – exists in most communities, but the programming – the "software" – desperately needs updating.

We need a dramatic investment in Jewish programming

Traditionally, the mainstream Jewish community, and especially the federations, focused on aiding the vulnerable. Yet today, federations and much of the Jewish communal infrastructure must take responsibility for building the Jewish identities of those whose Jewish connection is at risk. Many in our community, while physically comfortable, are Jewishly vulnerable, spiritually, intellectually, ideologically searching for direction, vision, passion and meaning within a Jewish framework. Our obligation to the needy remains strong, but, fortunately, other players in society also tend to most Jews' physical needs. Yet, if we don't build our community's Jewish identity and provide positive Jewish experiences for all Jews, young and old, who will?

Decades ago, when Rabbi Yitz Greenberg requested increased federation allocations to Jewish education in New York, the leaders hesitated.

"We don't have enough money to do what you request. What should we do? Shall we close down Jewish community centres, and the Jewish hospitals, nursing homes, and homes for the aged that we subsidize?" they said.

"Yes, close them down!" Rabbi Greenberg insisted. "But do you know what I'll teach the children who will receive the Jewish education that you will sponsor? I'll teach them to open up community centres, hospitals, nursing homes and homes for the aged!"

We, too, can plant those potent seeds, guaranteeing future generosity and leadership. We need a dramatic investment in Jewish programming at all levels, in all dimensions, from the young to the old, from the religious to the secular, reaching out to the culturally inclined, the politically connected, the intellectually engaged, the spiritually seeking, whoever they may be, wherever they may be.

We can already see such novel and effective identity-building vehicles at work.

Since late 1999, more than 130,000 young Jews have gone on trips sponsored by birthright israel, which has become the gold standard for gutsy, innovative, effective, youth-oriented programming.

In Montreal, every Friday night, the "Ghetto Shul" on Lorne Street welcomes more than 100 students, offering religious and secular Jews a rousing service, a home-cooked Shabbat meal and the opportunity to make lasting friendships as Jews, together.

In Boston, more than 2,500 Jews have finished the Me'ah program, devoted to 100 hours of Jewish learning over two years.

What unites all these innovations is the vision of the few dreamers who launched each of these now-established institutions and the passion of many participants who found that combining their interests as Jews and human beings created an exciting, mind-expanding synthesis.

Recently, various studies have helped define the problem for the next generation – and confirmed some strategies' effectiveness. One such study, "OMG!: How Generation Y is redefining Faith in the iPod Era" (OMG is text messaging shorthand for Oh My God!), discovered that the young "millennials" or twentysomethings of today are "the most diverse generation in history – only seven per cent of those polled have friends who are mostly the same religion as they are." Each young person's faith and connection to tradition therefore tends to be "informal" and "individualistic, without the reinforcement of institutional religious commitment."

'Can't give up on this generation'

A follow-up study, "Grande Soy Vanilla Latte with Cinnamon, No Foam: Jewish Identity and Community in a Time of Unlimited Choices," concluded that "Young Jews are proud to be Jewish, but struggle to define a meaningful concept of a 'Jewish community.'" In their highly impressionistic, idiosyncratic and customized searches, they do not necessarily reject Jewish institutions. Rather, many believe "the institutions have become irrelevant to the way young Jews are living their lives."

We can't afford to give up on this generation. We must figure out how to re-engage them. Research proving the effectiveness of day schools and the birthright israel program, in particular, balances out some of these daunting conclusions.

Another study, "The Jewishness Quotient of Jewish Day School Graduates: Studying the Effect of Jewish Education on Adult Jewish Behavior," identified "extensive Jewish day school education" as "the most important contributor to the formation of strong Jewish identities, so that Jewish agencies should provide for continuing Jewish education, and in particular, encourage and make possible the establishment of Jewish high schools."

> Great Jewish day schools today can guarantee a great community tomorrow

A Montreal-based study, "The Jewish High School Experience: Its Implications for the Evolution of Jewish Identity in Young Adults," produced by demographer Charles Shahar, looked specifically at Jewish high schools and concluded that, "graduates of Jewish high schools were significantly more likely to attend synagogue services," to "observe Jewish rituals," to "donate to Jewish causes and volunteer for Jewish organizations."

Moreover, a team of Brandeis University experts has tracked birthright israel since it began, uncovering a significant positive Jewish impact among an overwhelming majority of birthright returnees, an impact that so far seems to be quite influential in their lives and impressively sustaining.

When mounted together and integrated, all these strategies have a multiplier effect. In "Linking the Silos: How to Accelerate the Momentum in Jewish Education Today," published by the Avi Chai Foundation, Prof. Jack Wertheimer of the Jewish Theological Seminary notes that all these experiences resonate most effectively when the different educational and identity-building institutions in a community co-operate, so that Jews young and old have overlapping and mutually reinforcing experiences. That conclusion underscores the importance of having federations as the central players leading and coordinating these initiatives.

Donors have responded with record-setting generosity. In Boston, Cleveland, and Washington, mega-donors are writing cheques for $10 million and more, while federations are launching massive multi-year campaigns to raise Jewish education and identity-building dollars.

Canadian Jews are also hopping aboard the transformation train. In Montreal, the Alvin and Leanor Segal Family has committed serious time and money to reviving the Saidye Bronfman Center as a Jewish identity-building performing arts centre, while in Toronto, mega-gifts have been invested in Jewish day schools and a broader re-orientation and modernization of the community.

We need to invest in community-wide, program-oriented superfunds in order to finance five critical gateways, five doors that are proven to welcome Jews in and offer them the quality experiences and meaningful engagement they want and deserve.

- Jewish education for our youth: Great Jewish day schools today can guarantee a great community tomorrow. We need a massive re-commitment to and reinvestment in all of our schools, most especially our Jewish high schools, so that they remain affordable to all who are interested while serving as centres of educational excellence and models of creative, meaningful, spiritually deep and intellectually rich Jewish living. Our schools must be known for excellence in general studies along with depth and flexibility in Jewish education. We need to tap the bankbooks of the older generation to educate the younger generation.
- Arts and culture: Our cultural institutions must pulsate with modern rhythms and multiple modes of artistic expression. Living, as we do, in a leisure culture, in an age of entertainment, we must build flagship cultural institutions that offer challenging, enriching, mind-expanding, soul-stretching Jewish and humanist experiences in order to appeal to young and old alike – especially the elusive "Generation Y" and "empty nesters/retirees" who are the demographic cohorts most likely to attend and be most open to these kinds of artistic experiences.
- Israel experience: Every young Jew deserves the opportunity to go on a life-changing Israel trip. Trips to Israel, especially through the birthright israel program and the March of the Living experience, have an impressive track record of success. We must expand these magnificent programs to reach more students at a critical moment in their Jewish journeys. We also must create effective follow-up programs for the returnees while pioneering other, equally effective projects that strengthen Jewish identity here by building connections to Israel and overseas projects.

'Now is the time to be Jewishly ambitious'

- Camps and youth programming: We need Jewish camps and youth groups that supplement whatever formal learning young Jews have with positive, interactive, friendship-building and soul-stretching Jewish experiences. Dollar for dollar, these programs deliver the most bang for the programming buck. Requiring minimal capital investment compared to schools and Israel trips, great camps and effective youth programs motivate young Jews at critical developmental stages in their lives, allowing them to experience the 24/7 Judaism that research shows to be most effective in identity building, especially for teens and young adults.
- Family programming: We need parent education for the 21st-century mom and dad, who are often overburdened, overwhelmed and overwrought, but able – if directed – to find anchors in Jewish values and wisdom. The latest research shows that adults and their children mutually reinforce each other's Jewish engagements. We need to give parents the tools to create influential Jewish family experiences and to deepen their children's positive Jewish experiences in camps, Israel and schools at home. Without a serious commitment to Jewish living and learning among adults, it will be difficult to pass on a serious Jewish identity to their children and grandchildren.

We need big events that bring hundreds of Jews together for enlightening, inspiring, mind expanding, soul-enriching experiences, and we need intimate moments delivering the same excitement to smaller groups, tailored to individual sensibilities. We need book clubs, study groups, lectures, websites and chat lines that speak to modern Jews in relevant language with the latest technologies. And we need synagogues open to new members and new ideas, reaching out to families with family educators, welcoming young people, while continuing to serve longstanding members who have been the backbone of the community for so long.

Taglit-birthright israel, is an example of a program that has inspired many young people to further pursue their Jewish identities. [Isranet photo]

After the Holocaust, we proved that the Jewish community could survive. In the last quarter of the 20th century, we proved that we could thrive as citizens of the world, winning Nobel prizes, earning good salaries, securing impressive positions, producing lasting works of art, literature and scholarship.

At the start of this new century and new millennium, now is the time to be as Jewishly ambitious as we are professionally ambitious, to commit to Jewish renewal while continuing to flourish as citizens of an exciting, ever-changing new world. We need to invest boldly and dramatically in identity-building educational and cultural programs that will reach out to the unaffiliated, energize the already involved, and make each community the toast of the Jewish world by saving our Jewish kids, by welcoming interested Jews in at many different points along the life cycle, and building an exciting and meaningful future.

DIGGING ARCHEOLOGY

Two important archeological finds were announced last year. Left, in a modern-day neighbourhood in southern Jerusalem, the grave of Jesus and certain family members was said to be found by a team headed by Simcha Jacobovici. Right, archeologists from Hebrew University said they had found the burial site of Herod the Great, in Herodium.

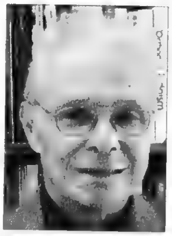
Renewing Commitment to community



By CHAIM I. WAXMAN

One of the differences between traditional and modern societies is the nature of the relationship between the individual and the larger collective. In traditional societies, the focus is on the collective, i.e., the society, state, ethnic group, family, etc. The group members have authority over the individual and it is the obligation of the individual to comply with the collective.

In modern society, the focus is on the individual, and it is the role of the collective to satisfy the needs and wants of individuals. For example, it is the role of the state to maximize the individual's potential for the pursuit of his or her happiness. The notion of civil rights, which focuses on the rights of individuals is, essentially, a modern one. Traditional societies focus on individual obligations rather than rights.

Jewish communities, with all their variations, are based on some notions of traditional collectivity. Jews are a religio-ethnic or ethno-religious group that incorporates traditional notions of individual obligations. There are obviously many universalistic principles in Judaism, but Judaism is definitely particularistic, and one of the greatest challenges for Jews in modern and "post-modern" times is to maintain a balance between the obligations of individuals to the collectivity and those of the collectivity to individuals.

The term "community" is used in a variety of contexts and has varying meanings. Even when applied to the context of Jews, it has variations. Historically, Jews defined themselves as sacred communities, and it is for this reason that older traditional synagogues had the abbreviation, "K'K," as a prefix to their names. It referred to the synagogue as the central institution of the kehilat kodesh (sacred community), from which, not only prayer but virtually all communal services, such as kosher food, education and social welfare, flowed. The community provided a range of services for its members and correspondingly exerted very broad and strong social control over them. Conformity with communal norms, including financial support, was maintained by the subjective allegiance of the members and by the threat of sanction, the ultimate one being the denial of burial rights.

The term "sacred," as the French sociologist, Emile Durkheim (1858-1917) pointed out, means "set apart and forbidden," that is, something out of the ordinary, be it an object or an idea. Nahmanides translates the biblical verse, Kedoshim tihyu ("You shall be holy") as perushim tihyu ("you shall be separate," i.e., not indulge in everything). The beliefs and practices of the group serve as its boundaries and help maintain the group's distinctiveness. At the same time, Judaism does not strive for robots or complete uniformity. It has always allowed for, and indeed, encouraged diversity. The question has always been the fine line between acceptable diversity and unacceptable deviance.

To a large extent, the position with respect to that fine line is related to contrasting perspectives on the state of the community. Some view the community as existing in a hostile environment that constantly threatens the community's very existence. Therefore, the community strives to insulate itself from outside influences and draws very firm lines delineating acceptable behaviour, with everything beyond those limits being defined as deviant. Others view the community as having a message to convey to the outside world and as sufficiently strong to resist threats from the outside. In order to convey its message to the outside world, the community must be welcoming to newcomers, and not only be tolerant of diversity, but encourage it. These contrasting perspectives have been present in Jewish history for at least the past two millennia and manifest themselves in contrasting perspectives with respect to conversion, as well as to converts and a variety of other "others."

With respect to conversion, we find two contrasting perspectives in the Babylonian Talmud. One is implicit in this statement in Avodah Zara 3a: "Converts were not accepted either in the days of David or in the days of Solomon." A similar negative attitude is the statement by Rabbi Helbo: "Converts are as problematic for Israel as a skin sore" (Kidushin 70b). Both Rashi and Tosafot say the reason is that born Jews will learn from the careless behaviour of converts. Elsewhere (Kalah Rabati 2:4) we find the statement that "Converts… prevent the arrival of the Messiah."

On the other hand, Rabbi Elazar had a very positive attitude, as seen in his statement: "The only reason God dispersed the Jews in the exile was so that converts would join them." (Pesachim 87b)

Contrasting perspectives on conversion

The contrasting positions on conversion are very relevant today, both in the Diaspora and in Israel. In the Diaspora, it is primarily relevant to the issue of children of intermarriages who consider themselves to be part of the Jewish community but are not Jewish according to traditional Jewish law, Halachah.

The more open position was expressed by the late Rabbi Moshe Feinstein (1895-1986), arguably the leading rabbinic decisor in the North American Orthodox Jewish community, who argued that many children of intermarried couples consider themselves to be Jewish, in any case, and will probably marry Jews. It is, therefore, preferable for them to convert, rather than preventing them from converting, and thereby increasing the rate of intermarriage.

A staunchly opposing position was recently propounded by Rabbi Moshe Sternbuch, the head of the Rabbinical Court of the Edah Haharedis and one of the leading decisors in the Israeli haredi community. Arguing, among other reasons, that such outreach only increases intermarriage, he asserted that "it is absolutely forbidden to try to proselytize a non-Jew even if he mistakenly views himself as Jewish." He staunchly rejected outreach efforts to them, and he then rejected all outreach efforts to the intermarried among Russian Jews.

The issue of intermarriage among olim from the former Soviet Union (FSU) is a very serious one in Israel, where it is estimated that approximately one-third of the million or so olim from the FSU are not Jewish according to Halachah but are sociologically Jewish in the sense that they view themselves as Jewish, their interactions are almost completely with Jews, most of them have no idea that they are not halachically Jewish, and their behaviour patterns are very similar to those of the Jewish population in Israel. How to deal with this pregnant issue is hotly debated, and robust positions are declared by both opponents and proponents of efforts to convert them. Ironically, there is reason to believe that only a minority would even be interested in such outreach efforts.

> Those who applied for conversion were traditionally discouraged, and only if they were very persistent, were they accepted

In part as a result of the historically negative attitude toward converts, those who applied for conversion were traditionally discouraged, and only if they were very persistent, were they accepted for conversion. Even after conversion, they were frequently perceived and treated as outsiders, both ritually and socially. Maimonides, Rambam, drew a sharp line between the broader attitude toward conversion and the attitude toward the individual convert. Although he subscribed to the notion of Rabbi Helbo cited above, he was also very critical of the mistreatment of converts.

A convert, Ovadiah, asked if he was permitted to say prayers that included lines such as "Our God and God of our fathers," "Thou who hast chosen us" and "Thou who hast worked miracles to our fathers." He had, in fact, been told that he should not do this, but should change the wording for prayers containing such statements. Maimonides strongly disagreed and assured him that, contrary to popular prejudice, he was a complete and equal Jew. Moreover, despite statements in the Talmud to the contrary, Maimonides instructed Ovadiah to say all of the prayers in the same way as a born Jew.

In another responsum, Maimonides discussed the extent of our obligations toward the convert and indicated that we are obligated to honour and fear our parents and to obey the prophets, all of which can be accomplished without loving. It is only the converts whom we are obligated to love with all of our hearts.

The issue of conversion has been discussed at some length because it is probably the one in which contrasting positions in social norms are clearest. But there are numerous instances where one can also see the contrasting attitudes toward "others." For example, there is a biblical prohibition against mamzerim, offspring of specific incestuous relationships, becoming part of the Jewish people, and most rabbis take an unequivocally conservative stance on that prohibition. And yet, the Talmud (Kidushin 71a) relates Rabbi Yohanan's more lenient stance in situations in which there is some doubt. Despite the rule that with respect to doubts involving biblical prohibitions one is to be stringent, he found a way to legitimate the adoption of a more open approach.

'Manifest identification'

The situation is similar with respect to attitudes toward those who unwittingly commit certain forms of relatively minor Sabbath and other infractions. For example, the medieval Sephardi scholar and decisor, Rabbi Yom Tov ben Avraham (Ritv'a, 1250-1330) and others ruled that when efforts to correct infractions would not be heeded, one should refrain from attempting to correct their ways, and "it is better that their transgression be the result of ignorance rather than of wilful sinning." Others, however, argued quite the reverse, saying that because of the widespread transgression, it is imperative to protest and to go to any lengths to prevent infractions.

In traditional society, individuals needed the community because it was through the community that they derived their identity. To be ostracized and rejected by the community was the severest sanction because it meant a loss of identity. That is why excommunication was so rare and reserved for only the most extreme deviants from communal norms.

To be ostracized and rejected by the community was the severest sanction

Excommunication was rare in Jewish history, and even when the community had strong social control over individuals, there were those who advocated a welcoming stance toward deviants, nonconformists and other "others," as will shortly be indicated. Today, however, western societies are non-traditional. Individuals no longer need religio-ethnic communities for their identity. They make their own identities. Today, in turn, the communities need the individuals. That is why "outreach" has become such a major part of religious institutions. As sociologist Peter Berger put it, we now have a population of uncoerced consumers and religious institutions have to "market" their "product" in order to attract "consumers." Clearly, the kinds of communal social controls that worked in traditional societies are no longer effective.

Not only have religious institutions become voluntary organizations, but the entire notion of "Jewish community" been transformed. In North America, both religion and ethnicity are increasingly voluntary statuses. Today, people choose whether to affiliate, and if they do, they opt for the religion of their choice. And, since most North American Jews are of multiple ethnic backgrounds, they can choose whether to identify ethnically and, if they do, with which ethnicity. Even among those who do identify as Jewish religiously and/or ethnically, the percentages who actually affiliate with the organized community are declining.

Jewish communities are almost entirely voluntaristic, consisting of individuals who are committed to serving the interests and values of Jews and Jewish togetherness and who have created and maintain organizations and institutions meant to serve and further these objectives. The organized life of the Jewish community is manifested through the ongoing existence and activities of the matrix of institutions, agencies and organizations that were created to serve a range of Jewish interests as variously defined in time and place.

To be a part of the Jewish community, therefore, requires a manifest, willing identification with it, through membership in any of the community's organizations, contributing to the community's philanthropic activity by pledging a donation, and/or engaging in any of the community's activities, formal or informal. As mentioned and as will be indicated, current evidence indicates that using these terms, we find a decreasing number of Jews displaying identification with the corporate body of the Jewish community as manifest in its formal organizational structures.

In 2000, the political scientist Robert Putnam presented, in his widely discussed book Bowling Alone, considerable data in support of his thesis that Americans are increasingly detached from social-communal groups and are less likely to be involved in civic activities. They are less likely to join PTAs, trade and labour unions, political parties and a host of other social groups, and this, he argues, has serious implications for the future of American society. The patterns are probably similar in much of Canada as well.

Although Putnam was impressed with the outpouring of voluntarism in the wake of the bombings of the World Trade Center in New York City, and he expressed the hope that this may have indicated a return to greater civic involvement, it appears that this is not the case. Last year, three sociologists presented in the American Sociological Review their findings that Americans say they have fewer close friends today than they had a decade ago, and that the number who say they have no one with whom to discuss important matters has doubled in that time to one in four. The weakening bonds of friendship have resulted in phenomena such as these: fewer people to turn to for help in crises such as Hurricane Katrina; fewer watchdogs to deter neighbourhood crime; fewer visitors for hospital patients; and fewer participants in community groups overall.

Retain the strong core while being open

North America's Jews are no different. Their engagement in civic activities has also diminished over time. Their rate of volunteering for communal causes has declined and they are much less likely to join Jewish organizations. Thus, the 2000-2001 National Jewish Population Survey found that the years between 1990 and 2000 saw a decline of close to 20 per cent in affiliation with major American Jewish membership organizations. Another indicator of the weakening bonds of community is the decline over the last few decades in rates of philanthropic giving to Jewish causes, which historically has been among the primary manifestations of belonging to the community.

Beyond the trends identified by Putnam, some of the reasons for the decline in communal participation relate to specific features of Jewish organizational life. Among these is the increasing perception that the communal leadership is elitist, parochial, self-serving and resistant to innovation, and discourages the active involvement of those who are not members of the "good old guys club," the circle of wealthy, older men who are at the helms of most major Jewish organizations. At least since the 1960s, younger people in the West have been raised to question authority and "the establishment," and they – and their children in turn – now do question, and adamantly at that.

Indeed, it is not only those who question authority that are left out of the community. Large numbers of Jews do not find a place in the community simply because they are "different," i.e., they do not conform to predominant patterns for reasons that have nothing to do with conscious challenging on their parts. I will mention only two, but there are considerably more.

One of the most conspicuous examples of "others" such as these is the large and growing singles population. Despite numerous articles, speeches and well-intentioned communal programs, there is still a large population of singles who feel that they are outsiders, that they have no place in the community because of their singles status.

Although the numbers are significantly lower, the poor, and even those with moderate incomes, are also left out of much of the life of the organized Jewish community, simply because it is very costly to affiliate Jewishly. It is probably the most costly in the United States, but the costs in most other western countries are not far behind. Indeed, there is evidence that part of the recent rise in the rate of aliyah – immigration to Israel – from the United States is due to the high cost of living Jewishly. If one takes a family of two parents and two primary school-age children, such cost typically includes synagogue membership dues and other fees ($1,000); day school tuition (up to $15,000 per child); summer camp ($4,000-6,000 per child), as a start. That means that a minimum of $40,000 annually is required just for the essentials of living Jewishly. (There is considerable evidence demonstrating the crucial role of day school education in reinforcing Jewish identity and identification.) Clearly, those who have moderate or low incomes, and even some who may have high incomes but have more than two children, including some in high school or college, may feel unable to be part of a community whose costs of affiliation are so high.

The challenge facing the community is to retain the strong core that makes it a real community comprised of interdependent parts, including common practices, common memory and interests that extend beyond itself, and to address the many goals that Jewish communities set for themselves, while, at the same time, being open to new ideas and practices that do not fly in the face of or undermine its basic values. It must constantly re-examine and re-evaluate the boundaries it sets for itself, and question to what extent those boundaries are based on clear communal principles and are, in fact, there for the well-being of the community; and to what extent personal prejudices have an impact on the establishment of those boundaries.

Sir Jonathan Sacks, chief rabbi of United Hebrew Congregations of the British Commonwealth, once captured the so-called "golden mean" of many modern Orthodox Jews who are convinced that they have and practice the ideal: "Of this, I am sure: that every Jew, from Neturei Karta to the most radical Reform, is convinced he or she is a centrist Jew. Wherever a Jew stands in the spectrum of commitment, those to the right of him are the fundamentalists and those to the left of him are the assimilators. By a miracle of cognitive geometry, the midway point between fanaticism and unacceptable compromise always coincides exactly with wherever the individual happens to stand. 'There are,' he or she says, 'so few sane Jews left'" (Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, Ed., Orthodoxy Confronts Modernity, Ktav 1991)

At the same time, it cannot be overlooked that those sectors of the large Jewish community with the most restrictive criteria for communal acceptance are precisely the ones that are not declining, whereas those with the more open stance have the higher rates of non-affiliation. Indeed, it appears that there is, in fact, an inverse relationship between the openness of communal standards and the rate of communal growth. Perhaps this suggests that rigidity of communal standards is a function of their clarity, which makes it all the more imperative that we find the "golden mean" that will balance the need for maintaining meaningful standards with the need to accommodate varieties of groups and individuals as well as creative novel ideas. These days of reflection are most appropriate for such communal soul-searching.

Renewing Tzedek, tzedek, tirdof

By IRWIN COTLER

I write these words in the month of Elul, on the eve of the High Holy Days, a period of remembrance and reflection, of repentance and resolution, and of moving toward a hopeful reaffirmation and renewal.

This essay addresses the renewal of ourselves as individuals, as a community and as a people, in the international arena under the rubric of the pursuit of justice – of "tzedek, tzedek, tirdof," anchoring ourselves in the Jewish values that underpin this pursuit of justice.

I am not unmindful of the fact that the pursuit of justice in our day – the struggle for human rights and international law – may invite the not uncynical rejoinder that, to paraphrase the philosopher Jeremy Bentham, justice and international law is so much "nonsense on stilts," rhetoric without remedy, of rights without writs, of semantics without sanctions.

Twenty-five years ago, I wrote of human rights as having emerged as the new secular religion of our time. I said that we were witnessing the internationalization of human rights and the humanization of international law. At the time, Father Robert Drinan wrote that "the elevation of human rights into an international juridical norm is the most dramatic development in the history of contemporary jurisprudence."

Yet today, in the face of the "gathering storm" reminiscent of the 1930s – when Jewish conclaves abound with the question, "Is it 1938 all over again?" – talk of justice and human rights has a sometimes dissonant ring to it.

I believe it important that at this juncture, we transcend that which passes for moral relativism, political correctness, let alone cynicism, and ground ourselves in the more eternal verities, values and vision that underpin who we are, and what we can aspire to be.

I begin at this moment of remembrance and reflection, with the remembrance of the teachings and example of my parents – of blessed memory. (My mother died two years ago on the eve of Rosh Hashanah.)

As my father, who was effectively my first law teacher, taught me, and would always remind me – and this is my omnipresent remembrance and reflection at this time – the pursuit of justice is equal to all the other commandments combined. He taught me that the pursuit of justice is a foundational principle of the shinantam l'vanecha – that thou shall teach it unto your children, a basic principle of intergenerational continuity.

Moreover, as the sages tell us, a student should not study in a city that does not have a tzedakah fund, for that is a place without neshamah – without soul, without tzaddikim, without righteous people. This is why, in the Hebrew language, as my parents taught me, the terms "justice," "charity" and "righteousness" are all derived from the same three letter root: tzedek – and why the notion of "justice, justice, shall you pursue" is as prophetic as it is profound.

While being sworn in as minister of justice, I repeated silently to myself, "Son of Nathan and Faye Cotler" when taking the oath. This was not part of the official oath, but I knew that I was standing there only because of the values that had been imparted to me by my parents. I then began my media scrum, after being sworn in, by stating the following, "That I will be guided in my work by one over-arching principle, that of tzedek, tzedek tirdof. And within that, the promotion of the protection of equality not just as a foundational principle of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but equality as a basic principle for the building of a just society; and the promotion and protection of human dignity, for the building of a society that was not only just, but one that was compassionate and humane." In stating these words, the teaching of my parents was finding expression in my first media encounter.

Thinking about this afterward – that if the pursuit of justice was to be my overarching priority – I went about the country to ask Canadians what they regarded the pursuit of justice as being – what would their priorities be if they were the minister of justice and attorney general of Canada?

> The pursuit of justice is equal to all the other commandments combined

As it happened, my first meeting was with a group of aboriginal law students who were part of the first-ever aboriginal law school in Nunavut. It was a compelling experience that I believe has implications for our own understanding of tzedek, tzedek, tirdof, of who we are and what we might aspire to be.

The students said to me, "Professor Cotler we're not just law students, we're aboriginal law students. We come with a past, a history, a heritage, a language, a culture, an identity with our own indigenous legal tradition – and we've been dispossessed from all of that. We've been dislocated from our history, heritage, language, culture, identity and our legal tradition. It's not that we go to court because we want to nurture a grievance – rather, we go to court to reaffirm who we are."

'We are not just atomized individuals'

They added, "We go to court to be reconnected to our history and heritage. We go to court to anchor ourselves in our language, in our culture, in our identity, in our own indigenous legal tradition… Regrettably, in whatever we do, we are accompanied by a great deal of pain. Tragically, the government doesn't understand – often the people of Canada don't understand – the pain that always accompanies us."

I shared with them a parable that comes from our tradition. In it, a group of students come to their rabbi and they say, "Rabbi, we love you." The rabbi says, "Do you know what hurts me?" The students ask, "Rabbi, why do you ask if we know what hurts you if we tell you we love you?" And the rabbi answers, "If you don't know what hurts me, you can't tell me you love me."

This is a profound principle of human relationships. It is also a profound principle that governments must themselves appreciate in their relationships with the disadvantaged and the most vulnerable in our society – such as aboriginal people.

I then went on to say something else to them. "I hope you won't find this presumptuous, but I also come from an aboriginal people – a people that still inhabits the same land, worships the same God, embraces the same aboriginal abrahamic religion, studies the same aboriginal Torah, harkens to the same aboriginal prophets, speaks the same aboriginal language – Hebrew – and bears the same aboriginal name – Israel – as we did 3,500 years ago." At that moment, the students came up to me and said, "We thought this was going to be yet another speech – yet another 'blah blah' – from a white man. Welcome one aboriginal person to another."

There is a message in all of this: we are not just atomized individuals – rather, we are part of an aboriginal people with a history and a heritage, a people anchored in the notion, in the principle, with all its universal resonance, of tzedek, tzedek, tirdof; and we should not compromise who we are on the alter of political correctness. For we will invite respect if we give expression to our own authenticity, our own history and heritage – our own ideals and our vision.

And if, as Hillel taught us, one can sum up the whole of the Torah in one sentence, "Do not do onto others that which is hateful onto you," so the whole notion of Jewish values and human rights – the jurisprudential norm for tzedek, tzedek, tirdof – can be summed up in Hillel's trilogy.

First, "If I am not for myself who will be for me." If we do not affirm our history and our heritage, our ethics and our ethos, our values and our vision, how can we expect others to understand who we are, let alone respect that sense of tzedek, tzedek, tirdof in its universal resonance?

Second, if we do not involve ourselves in the larger struggles for human rights and human dignity in our times – whether it be the struggle against racism and anti-Semitism, the struggle against discrimination of any kind, the struggle for women's rights, the struggle on behalf of the disadvantaged, the struggle for global human rights – if we do not involve ourselves in the larger struggle for human rights and human dignity in our times, we will not only diminish that struggle by our absence but we will also diminish ourselves as Jews.

Third, the struggle for human rights and human dignity, and the struggle for justice, has to have a sense of moral urgency about it. It is not something that can be done by marching with a placard once a year and saying, "I've done my thing for whatever the case and cause happens to be." Rather, the struggle means being in the trenches of human rights day in and day out.

May I share with you, however briefly, a set of seven basic Jewish values – that also have universal resonance – that underlie this Hillel idiom, and constitute the foundational principles of the pursuit of justice.

Whoever saves a single life, it is as if they have saved an entire universe

The first value is that of zachor – remembrance. As we say every year when we commemorate the Holocaust – unto each person there is a name, unto each person there is an identity, unto each person is a universe. As our sages tell us, whoever saves a single life, it is as if they have saved an entire universe, thereby giving expressing to the sanctity of human life in the context of remembrance – so appropriate in this period of remembrance and reflection.

Another feature of zachor is that it is inextricably bound up with Jewish identity. For what does it mean to say as we say at Passover every year – that in every generation each person must see himself or herself as if we, too, experience the oppression of slavery, and as if we, too, experience the exhilaration and the purpose of liberation?

We are reminded therefore – and this brings me to the second value – that zachor is bound up not only with Holocaust remembrance but also with Jewish identity in the most profound sense and with the principle of equality in our identity. For we are reminded at all times that we were strangers in Egypt, and the notion of stranger is repeated 36 times in the Bible to make the point that "you shall have one law for you and the stranger." The notion of equality, therefore, is at the core of this principle of zachor, as zachor is at the core of our identity.

Guard against assaultive speech

These principles of remembrance and quality – foundational principles of the Jews as an aboriginal people – give rise to a third value: the danger of assaultive speech. And here, too, I was taught early on by my mother, who exemplified this throughout her life, that "life and death is on the tip of the tongue"; that the pronouncement that we will be repeating during these High Holy Days, that one should not go up and down the community as a gossip, as a slanderer, is a fundamental moral precept. And indeed, the liturgy during the High Holy Days is replete with admonitions against hateful and assaultive, defamatory speech.

It is important, with respect to the whole question of assaultive speech, to guard against it in all its configurations. It has profound lessons for human relationships and can be destructive of those human relationships. It has profound lessons for a community, for a people, for it was this assaultive speech that brought about the destruction of the Temple. And it has profound lessons for relationships between states and peoples.

For one of the more enduring lessons of the Nazi Holocaust is that the genocide of European Jewry succeeded not only because of the industry of death and the technology of terror but also because of the ideology, the pathology of hate. It was this state-sanctioned teaching of contempt, this demonizing of the other, this is where it all began. As the Supreme Court of Canada affirmed in upholding the constitutionality of our anti-hate legislation: the Holocaust did not begin in the gas chambers, it began with words.

These, as the court put it, are the chilling facts of history – the catastrophic effects of racism. And we have been witness, in our own time, to a growing trafficking in hate, which took us down the road to ethnic cleansing in the Balkans, to the genocide in Rwanda.

And we are witness today, yet again, to state-sanctioned genocidal anti-Semitism whose epicentre is President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's Iran, the toxic convergence of the advocacy of the most horrific of crimes – namely genocide, with the most enduring of hatreds, namely anti-Semitism, propelled in a publicly avowed intent to acquire nuclear weapons for that purpose, and dramatized by the parading in the streets of Tehran a Shihab-3 missile draped in the emblem, "Wipe Israel off the map."

It should not be surprising that the importance of zachor, of equality, of the dangers of state-sanctioned hate, should lead inexorably to the fourth value, "Thou shall not sit idly by while thy brother's blood is being shed." Indeed, it follows right after the admonitions against assaultive speech, and it is anchored in yet another lesson of zachor – which has universal resonance – the danger of silence, the consequences of inaction.

Indeed, the Holocaust and the genocides of history happened not only because of the industry of death and the ideology of hate but also because of crimes of indifference, because of conspiracies of silence, the conspiracies of bystanders to evil. And we have witnessed an appalling indifference in our own day that took us down the road to the unthinkable: ethnic cleansing in the Balkans – and the unspeakable: genocide in Rwanda – unspeakable because no one can say that we did not know. We knew and we did not act, just as today in Darfur, we know and we are not acting.

It is our responsibility, as a community, as a people, wherever we may be, to break down these walls of indifference, to shatter these conspiracies of silence, to stand up and be counted and not look around to see whoever else is standing before we make a judgment to do so. For in the world in which we live, there are few people prepared to stand – let alone to be counted.

We must remember at all times that the notion of "never again" must not just be an idle slogan – it has to be a call to action, it has to be a moral imperative; and it has to be anchored in yet another one of our principles: that each of us, wherever we are, are the guarantors of each other's destiny.

Experience That Talks -- Solutions That Work

'It just needs to be a touch of human kindness'

This leads us to the fifth value – the protection of the vulnerable. Indeed, our tradition teaches us – and the High Holy Days are a constant reminder for us – that the test of a just society is how it treats the most vulnerable among us: children, women, minorities, refugees, the elderly, the sick, the disadvantaged and the like.

At this moment of reflection, I am reminded of the words spoken to me by my daughter, Gila, when she was 15 years old. She is now a 27-year-old law student. Those words were a profound lesson in human rights for me. She said, "Daddy, if you want to know what the real test of human rights is, always ask yourself, at any time, in any situation, in any part of the world, is it good for children? Is what is happening good for children? That is the real test of human rights, daddy." At this period of reflection and renewal, children should be the focal point of our concern.

As our sages remind us – and this is a sixth value – it is as a result of righteous women that the Jewish people were liberated from Egypt. And so, the notion that women's rights are human rights, and that there are no human rights that do not include the rights of women must be a priority on the justice agenda; not just as a matter of rhetoric but also as a matter of principle and policy, and that holds true within our community as well. The principle of gender equality – of gender equity – must pervade whatever we do.

This brings me to the seventh and final value in this pursuit of justice – that tikkun olam must be the clarion call for the pursuit of justice in the international arena.

And I am reminded here of another profound teaching of my parents, that if you want to pursue justice, you have to have a sense of injustice; otherwise the pursuit of justice is an undue abstraction.

And if we look around, what we witness is a pervasive sense of injustice – the pervasiveness of mass atrocities, the pervasiveness of poverty, the pervasiveness of inequality. All this is so shocking and demeaning to the human condition that tikkun olam becomes an overriding imperative.

I am talking about a situation in which the assets of three of the richest people in the world exceed the combined gross domestic product of 48 of the world's poorest developing countries. I'm talking of a situation in which three billion people in the world live in poverty, earning less than two dollars a day. Half of them, 1.5 billion people, live in extreme poverty, earn less than a dollar a day. I'm talking about a situation in which 4.4 billion people – three-fifths of humanity – have no access to basic sanitation. I'm talking about a situation in which more than 130,000 Africans die every week of preventable causes.

In the face of these numbing statistics, it must be remembered that behind every one of these horrific statistics is a human being. It is not surprising that in light of these numbing and horrifying numbers, the question arises, "But what can I do, what can I do in the face of this pervasive injustice?" The words of our sages come back to remind us: it may not be incumbent upon you to complete the work, but it is incumbent upon you to begin it.

In the end, we must go back to the beginning – to the notion that tzedek, tzedek, tirdof is equal to all the other commandments combined, that it must pervade whatever we do as individuals, as a community, as a people and as a government – and that the pursuit of justice must always be anchored in that sense of injustice.

As Maimonides put it in his statement "On the Value of Good Action," one should look at the world as being half good and half bad so that with only one good action one can shift the balance for oneself, and the rest of the world, to the side of the good. In a time of assault on human rights, at a time of pervasive injustice, we should appreciate that each one of us must see himself and herself as having an indispensable role to play in this indivisible struggle with respect to tikkun olam, and the pursuit of justice, beginning now with resolve and renewal at the start of this Jewish New Year.

Each one of us, if we reflect upon it, and we act so as to renew ourselves, has the capacity every day to do something on behalf of some victim somewhere of discrimination and disadvantage and disability. It does not have to be the whole macro thing of "human rights in the abstract." It does not have to be tikkun olam only in the macro sense of the word. It just needs to be a touch of human kindness – a touch of chesed every day. It may be in the kind word spoken or the unkind word not spoken, in guarding ourselves against assaultive speech. It may be in the visiting of the sick, because as our sages remind us, those who do not visit the sick, it is as if they are shedding their blood.

It may be in the treatment of the stranger, the immigrant, the refugee. It may be in the respect for the elderly. It may be the realization that again, as our teachings put it – the world is a narrow bridge and we are all connected to one another in this global village. Pursuing justice, doing justice one by one, ourselves and in our human relationships, within our community and within our people, between peoples and between states – that is what tikkun olam and the pursuit of justice is all about. That is why remembering and reflecting, resolving and affirming, and now renewing our commitment to tzedek, tzedek, tirdof is so important.

We need not merely dream of building a just society. Through the doing of justice, through pursuing justice as a call to action, through our ma'asim tovim – good deeds – we need not only dream of building a just society. We can help build it.

Professor Irwin Cotler is the official opposition critic for human rights and former minister of justice and attorney-general of Canada. He is a professor of law (on leave, McGill University).

Renewing Tzedakah and tikkun olam

By SALLY MENDELSOHN

For each of the past two summers, my family has spent three weeks in Rwanda, working on health care projects.

Why, you might ask, did we choose to spend summer vacations volunteering in Africa? Why Rwanda? Why work in a country so poor that it's hard to see how its people can escape their desperate poverty? Certainly there are people in our own communities who need our help.

Actually, our involvement stems directly from our Jewish roots, and the experiences we have had in Rwanda have contributed substantially to our Jewish and spiritual lives. We see this project as renewing and broadening our commitment to tzedakah and tikkun olam.

Finding Rwanda on our map

Three years ago, a friend, a pediatric AIDS physician, told us about his travels to Rwanda, where he helped develop medical protocols for the children of HIV-positive women. At that point, we had only a superficial awareness of this African country, and that was thanks to the movie Hotel Rwanda.

As the movie recounts, in April of 1994, a violent Hutu party took control of the government, the army and the country of Rwanda and launched a genocidal attack upon the Tutsi minority and moderate Hutus. In 100 days, an estimated 800,000 to 1.2 million men, women and children were murdered. An estimated 250,000 women were raped. In many if not most rape cases, HIV-infected Hutu men raped Tutsi women. According to survivor testimony, in many cases, the rapist made it clear to his victim that she would pass the disease on to her unborn child and that both would die a slow death.

After the violent Hutu government and army were defeated, many of the perpetrators of the genocide were indicted and incarcerated. In prison, HIV-positive perpetrators received anti-retroviral treatment, which allowed them to survive with a long-term chronic illness.

In contrast, the rape victims often returned to their homes with an undiagnosed and untreated disease. Over time, AIDS claimed the lives of an ever-growing number of these women and their children.

Listening to the story of genocidal rape, it seemed to me that the Rwandan genocide was not over. Every time a victim of genocidal rape dies of AIDS, every time a victim's child is born with AIDS, the genocide continues.

As we read and learned more, we found an eerie echo of Jewish history in the story of the Rwandan genocide. A radical group spewed forth propaganda of hate, gained control of the government and organized the society in support of a crazed program to murder and eliminate a whole people. Hundreds of thousands of people were selected from among their neighbours and slaughtered because of their ethnic heritage. And after the nightmare, thousands of people living in the Diaspora returned to rebuild their homeland.

But in this sub-Saharan African version of the story, we individually, and as North Americans, and as Jews, were the bystanders who were silent while one million died.

My husband, an idealistic and bold fellow, reached out to public leaders, including the former Canadian ambassador to the United Nations, Stephen Lewis, to ask for advice about how we could act upon our desire to help Rwanda.

Lewis, who now operates the Stephen Lewis Foundation funds, which fund AIDS-related community-based initiatives in Africa, encouraged us to meet with a not-for-profit organization that provides medical care primarily to women and children with HIV/AIDS, with a special focus on women who were infected with HIV through genocidal rape, and on their families. This group was beginning to work with the medical staff of a rural health centre outside the capital Kigali, with the goal of improving maternity care at the centre.

After a few meetings, this organization invited me, a midwife with more than 20 years of clinical experience in hospitals, homes and birth centres, and eight years of teaching experience at New York University's midwifery education program, to visit its health centre, work with Rwandan midwives, and offer my assessment and advice. I found the invitation tempting. But the decision to go to Rwanda was really made for me when our 22-year-old daughter, Lea Lowenfeld, said, "Come on, Mom, a Jewish midwife and her daughter in Africa – we'll be like Shifra and Puah."

Work of the staff was inspiring

That did it for me. We booked travel tickets for three.

Seeing Rwanda as a midwife

My goals were first to observe, listen and learn about maternity care in Rwanda. I knew from my research that Rwanda has one of the worst maternal mortality rates in the world. There are only a few obstetricians/gynecologists and midwives serving a country of more than eight million people with a birth rate higher than four per cent. Most women give birth at home, and many of these births are unattended. In the rural health clinics, most maternity care is provided by nurses.

I spent much of my time visiting different health-care facilities. I had an opportunity to work in hospitals and in health centres in the capital Kigali and in the countryside. I was repeatedly impressed by the courage and dedication of both the professionals and the childbearing women themselves. I found the care providers to be optimistic, willing to learn and eager to upgrade their skills. Many of them are as well prepared as their counterparts in North America. Unfortunately, adverse conditions challenge their ability to provide adequate care.

The health-care facilities, staffing and equipment are lacking in every respect. For example, at Muhima Hospital in Kigali, the busiest maternity hospital in Rwanda, the obstetric and midwifery staff deliver approximately 40 babies a day – that's more than 12,000 babies a year – yet the labour ward has only four beds. As a rule, there are two or three labouring mothers sharing each bed. Other women walk around, kneel or squat while they labour. Four delivery tables are lined up side by side in the one large delivery room.

A precious moment at the clinic

And it is common to find two or three tiny neonates sharing one infant-warming unit. Mothers are routinely sent home at six hours after a normal delivery, simply because the beds are needed for the next arrivals.

In the countryside health centres, the situation is even more challenging. The shortages of medical equipment and trained specialists are not the only problems at these centres. In many cases, it's the lack of hospital beds with clean mattresses and sheets, working sinks, working toilets and showers, or even reliable electricity.

It was inspiring to realize that a staff of dedicated professionals is able to achieve decent outcomes in a population of mostly healthy childbearing women, despite the inadequacies of the health-care system. But even the most dedicated staff cannot overcome these inadequacies when trying to meet the needs of acute and chronically ill patients.

Learning from Rwanda's helpers

Numerous aid workers assist the Rwandan Government in its efforts to improve health care. Idealists with vision as well as practical strategies assemble the resources and enlist the energy of others to bring about improvement and progress toward reaching the country's goals. We have been privileged to have some of these people as our guides and teachers.

Josh Ruxin directs Columbia University's Millennium Village and Access Projects in Rwanda. These programs strive to achieve the UN Millennium Development Goals – the eight goals range from halving extreme poverty to halting the spread of HIV/AIDS and providing universal primary education – for 2015. Ruxin understands that poverty and its related problems can only be tackled through a comprehensive program. His teams work with the Rwandan government in the Mayange region in a co-ordinated effort to improve medical care, agriculture, education and economic development. (Ruxin and his wife, Alissa, also host and lead an annual Passover seder in Kigali.)

Paul Farmer, a medical anthropologist and Harvard MD, teaches that the poor deserve the same quality health care as the rest of society. With the support of the Clinton and Gates foundations, Farmer and his colleagues at Partners in Health (PIH) have rebuilt and refurbished an old hospital building in one of the poorest regions of Rwanda, and now run it as a modern, state-of-the-art hospital facility for the care of the destitute poor. The hospital treats patients with a range of problems, including AIDS, tuberculosis, malaria and malnutrition.

PIH also serves the community beyond health-care needs. The organization works in conjunction with the public health sector to provide social support and to advocate for patients and their families to have access to clean water, decent housing, education and food in addition to primary health care. PIH's work demonstrates how supplementing medications with basic necessities such as food, housing and education has led to monumental differences in patient outcomes and the health of communities.

Optimism and energy in Rwanda

Katharine Anastos, an HIV/AIDS doctor and researcher from the Bronx, began working with community-based organizations in Rwanda early in 2004. She and her colleagues at Women's Equity in Access to Care and Treatment (We-Act) direct several health centres around Kigali, where HIV-testing, care, treatment, support and education is provided. In active partnership with the Rwandan government and several local NGO partners, the centres focus on empowering HIV-positive women and girls to take charge of their lives and become leaders in the fight against AIDS.

Anastos and her colleagues do not see their efforts as a western project. They see themselves as assisting and supporting local people who must direct and continue the effort.

In addition to the professionals with their technical skills, we encountered other people who came to Rwanda to help in their own ways:

We met a graduate student from New York who founded a theatre arts group for talented youngsters in Kigali. A group of students from Arkansas came to tutor Rwandan students in English and math. A recent graduate of the Parsons School of Design brought art supplies to a school in Mayange and ran three days of art classes. In the final session, she brought in four hand-held video cameras, taught students how to operate the cameras, and we watched as the students created impromptu videos of each other in the classroom. (These cameras were left as a donation to the school.)

Rwanda today is not just for volunteers and dreamers of the not-for-profit type. It is also attracting people who want to do business there. CNN.com recently quoted Eric Schmidt, Google's CEO, who said that in Rwanda there is "genuine opportunity for business," adding that "the country's reform-minded government is also one of the continent's most stable and least corrupt." The optimism and energy that we felt in the country draws others as well.

Seeing Rwanda through a Jewish lens

Some of our experiences in Rwanda made us see similarities between Rwandans and Jews. For example, even as they move forward, Rwandans are strongly committed to preserving their history and memorializing the genocide. The murders and the genocidal violence occurred inside the homes, churches, and schools of Rwandan communities, in the same places where they lived and where they still live. So genocide memorials are found in almost every town.

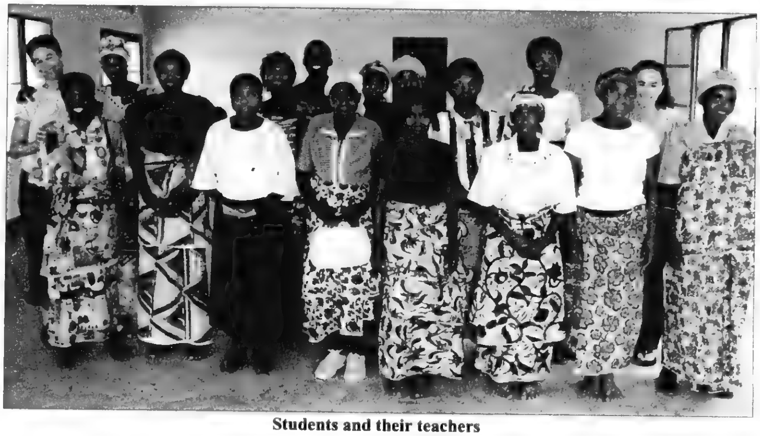
The most graphic memorials are found inside large churches and school buildings where tens of thousands of men, women and children who sought refuge were brutally murdered. Mass graves were created. Bloodstained clothing was hung on clotheslines. Rooms are filled with the actual skulls, skeletons and limbs of the victims, treated with lye, and laid out in endless rows, cataloguing and demonstrating the reality of the genocide beyond any possibility of denial.

As we viewed these dry bones, we read from Chapter 37 of Ezekiel. "And he placed me in the centre of the valley. It was full of bones. And he led me around and around and there were many bones spread out in the valley, very dry bones." The chapter describes Ezekiel's prophecy of the bones coming back to life, God's fulfillment of that prophecy, and God's promise to restore life to the dry bones of the vanquished people of Israel.

In this place, these lines read more like a literal description than like a poem rich in imagination. For the first time, I could picture the horrors, making me wonder what the prophet had seen that inspired this image.

Reading other Jewish texts and davening in Rwanda, a poor, pre-modern, vulnerable society, led us to read some of our familiar texts in a more literal way. For example, the words of the siddur seemed more immediate and less poetic. Praying for the blessing of a good year during which we are sated by the good of the land is no metaphor in a land of subsistence agriculture. Praying for the restitution of judges, justice and law is no metaphor in a country where the legal system had an acute collapse, and where almost five per cent of the population stands charged with genocidal acts.



Students and their teachers

It made us think of our rabbis who wrote the prayers not only as poets but also as social commentators and spiritual activists. Their words reflect the social needs of their day and should inspire us to see and address the social needs of our own times.

One more Jewish story from Rwanda

One Shabbat morning three young volunteers asked us, "What did the Jewish community do in 1994?"

‘Jews can be strong workers on behalf of others in need’

“Why are you asking?” we replied uneasily, uncomfortable at being cast in the role of Jewish historian or worse, spokesperson, responding to these young Jewish volunteers, who asked further, “At our shuls and all over the Hillels at school, we see signs about Darfur. But what did the Jewish community do during the Rwandan genocide?”

We didn’t have a good answer to this question – only to say that perhaps this is why we are here now and why the Jewish community is actively trying to stop another genocide in Darfur.

Thinking of Rwanda on Rosh Hashanah

When I sit in shul these upcoming Days of Awe, I know that I will think of Rwanda, especially when our liturgy quotes the prophet Isaiah as saying that God’s house is to be called a “house of prayer on behalf of all people.”

I’ll think about how we Jews can be strong workers on behalf of our own people as well as on behalf of others in need. I’ll pray that in the coming year, the vulnerable poor of the world will enjoy a bountiful harvest. I’ll think about those who are trying to bring the blessings of medicine, education, justice and prosperity to Rwanda. I’ll think about what I can do to improve the life of even one person in need, whether in my neighbourhood, in Israel, or someplace far away, yet not so foreign, like Rwanda.

Renewing Jewish reading

By SARA R. HOROWITZ

Literary Confessions

Many among my friends and acquaintances confess that, along with their machzor, they tuck books into the tallit bags and totes that they bring to shul for the High Holy Days. The machzor, of course, is for davening. The book is for downtime, as defined by the individual reader: slow points in the service, overly long chazzanut, uninspiring responsive readings, less-than-stellar sermons. Common practice is for the reader to place the book inside the machzor, and to read it discreetly, while – to all outward appearances – looking like he or she is engaged in the service.

I can't say with any certainty just how widespread this practice is. Suffice it to say that – perhaps owing to the discretion of its practitioners – I became aware of it fairly late in my shul-going life (which began, I am assured, in utero). But I know now that many people cluster in Jewish book stores or in the Judaica section of large chains looking for just the right Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur read.

Not just any book will do. Although those engaged in clandestine shul reading are going against the grain, for most, it is a practice that has evolved certain principles. Most shul-readers I've spoken with agree that the High Holy Days is no time to catch up on Jason Bourne's antics or Oprah's latest picks. In fact, most view their reading not as resistance to Rosh Hashanah liturgy, but as an enhancement of its spirit. They look for books with a Jewish theme, ranging from High Holy Day readings to Torah commentaries to Jewish history, literature and philosophy.

While the shul-readers may constitute only a small subculture among High Holy Day worshippers, for many more, the act of reading is a prelude to, heightening of, or catalyst for the introspection and renewal demanded by Rosh Hashanah. As such, I take this sub-rosa reading as an emblem of the intensification of Jewish reading more broadly that also occurs before and after the holidays, helping to focus readers, to fine-tune their kavanah, and to deepen their thinking.

As the heat of summer gestures towards the crispness of autumn, people turn to me for suggestions for High Holy Day shul reads. Might I recommend a more contemporary novel, an author or a poet? Something dealing with penitence, perhaps, or with spirituality, with a bit of mysticism tossed into the mix?

Literature and Liturgy

Much as the literature professor in me warms to requests to dip into the magic barrel (to borrow a phrase from Bernard Malamud), these particular recommendations always give me pause. Can the literary impulse. with its delight in esthetics, its playfulness and its unruly impulses, be brought into the compass of the moral accounting and religious awe that are at the centre of these Yamim Nora'im, the High Holy Days?

'Attentiveness to the poetry deepens prayer'

Cynthia Ozick, one of the finest living Jewish novelists, has commented on the sharp dichotomy between the literary and the Jewish sensibilities. In Quarrel and Quandary, a 2001 collection of essays, Ozick notes a fundamental distinction between the stringent ethical and ritual requirements of Judaism, on the one hand, and the boundless freedom of the literary imagination, on the other: "Fiction has license to do anything it pleases," she observes. "Fiction is liberty at its purest."

If so, does literature have a proper place in serious preparation for Rosh Hashanah, during the Ten Days of Penitence, or, most palpably, slipped between the pages of a machzor?

Cynthia Ozick

It is, of course, meaningless to ask whether literature has such a place. It already holds a central place. In the Slichot penitential prayers that begin in the month of Elul and throughout the machzor, literature holds a special, privileged place. The High Holy Day liturgy is thick with literary compositions, as well as highly refined and intricate poetic forms.

The two liturgical confessions that hold centre stage in the Yom Kippur machzor are literary constructs, whose recitation of transgressions follow the needs of literary form. Both the Viddui zuta, or the little confession – the one that begins with the words "ashamnu, bagadnu, gazalnu" – and the Viddui rabbah, or the great confession – the one that repeats the words "Al cheit shechatanu," for the sin that we sinned – are poems composed in the Geonic Period (ninth and 10th centuries) that are built on a single and a double alphabetic acrostic, respectively. These are only two examples of the acrostic poems that fill the machzor, following the contours of the Hebrew alphabet or spelling out an author's name or some central key word or concept. Moreover, the most powerful, dramatic moments of the service build on the power of poetic language. Originally intended for recitation on Yom Kippur, Unetaneh Tokef ("Let us acclaim"), for example, whose composition is attributed to Rabbi Amnon of Mayence (Mainz, Germany), so captivated the religious imagination of the Jewish communities who recited it that it was incorporated into the Rosh Hashanah liturgy as well.

Machzor is densely packed with devotional poems largely composed
in the Middle Ages

The machzor that we have inherited is densely packed with piyutim, or devotional poems, that were largely composed in the Middle Ages. Yet many contemporary worshippers find the majority of these piyutim inaccessible – because of the denseness of the poetic language, the intricacy of the poetic form, and, for some, the often lacklustre translations. Ironically, it is often at precisely those moments when the service lingers on these stunning piyutim that people slip the extra reading matter into their machzor.

Sometimes, the very literariness of liturgical compositions can work against the ideas they express. For example, midrash scholar David Stern recollects the crisis of faith he experienced upon first realizing, as a yeshiva student, that the confession recited in the Yom Kippur Viddui followed the alphabet. In "The ABC's of Confession," he remembers, "I had been reciting this prayer… assuming not only that every word counted, but that every word was there to cover a different kind of transgression, to make us confess and acknowledge a different species of shortcoming or sin. And now I realized that this was not so – that the reason you had bagadnu after ashamnu was not because devastation led to betrayal or that these were even different types of transgressions, but because you needed a word for sinning that began with a bet."

Struggling with the tension between demands of esthetic form and religious meaning, Stern comes to recognize that plunging deeply into the prayer as poem dissolves the tension. A real attentiveness to the elements of poetry deepens the experience of prayer. From his wife, poet Kathryn Hellerstein, he comes to appreciate how "the most exacting and rigorous formal requirements elicit the most intense and concentrated expressions of feeling."

Bearing this in mind when called upon to recommend literary readings for the Yamim Nora'im, I like to recommend the machzor itself, along with a book or an article on medieval Hebrew poetry, such as Raymond Scheindlin's The Gazelle: Medieval Hebrew Poems on God, Israel, and the Soul or Jakob Petuchowski's Theology and poetry: Studies in the Medieval Piyyut.

Understanding how a piyyut works as a poem and what theological concept it frames opens up the liturgy in breathtaking ways. In the best of circumstances, the labour of working through a poem coalesces with the labour of working through one's self. Together, the two processes intensify the cheshbon ha-nefesh, the personal accounting, and the aspiring toward the Divine that open up the possibilities of renewal promised by the High Holy Days.

Discontents of Modernism

Ozick's contention about an essential incompatibility between the literary and the religious impulse – the one, unfettered, the other beholden to morality – becomes more difficult to negotiate when looking for more contemporary Jewish literature to usher in and enhance the spiritual work of the Yamim Nora'im. From the Enlightenment onward, literature has valued individuality, skepticism and liberty, while Judaism calls for moral seriousness, restraint, and collective conscience.

Modern Jewish literature, in particular, has often been a secular venue that charts the search for alternatives to traditional ways of life. Nineteenth and 20th century literature in Yiddish and in Hebrew maps the author's struggles with a tradition ambivalently seen as overly confining, restrictive and parochial, but, frequently at the same time, also as stable, protective, nurturing and benign. Writers created esthetic works that traced their struggles with modernity and its impact on Jewish ways of life.

The same ambivalent mixture of love and repudiation of Jewish texts and traditions marks mid-20th century North American literature by such masters as Saul Bellow, Bernard Malamud, Mordecai Richler, Henry Roth, and Philip Roth. Drawing on Jewish texts, history and experiences but also shrugging off their particularism and constraints, these writers embrace modernity and the New World with its freedom and open invitation, and they also struggle with the anomie and void that comes with that embrace.

> Narratives captured the process of acculturation

Indeed, for much of the 20th century, the fiction of Jewish immigrants and their progeny wrote its way into American and Canadian cultures with narratives that captured the process of acculturation through a distancing from Jewish traditional practices, construed mockingly or nostalgically as relics of a European life left behind, a wellspring of historical or textual memories, that, depending on the author, the novel, or the poem, would oppress or elevate. You could say that for many Jewish North American writers and their readers, literature served, in a sense, as an alternative grounding for Jewish ethics and values that in the past had been derived more directly from religious learning and practice. Literary texts became, in some senses, the modernist's alternative to sacred text.

At first encounter, then, this body of literature may seem discordant with the mood of the High Holy Days. The irreverence, playfulness and irony of such authors, their reliance on self rather than on received authority, and their path from the synagogue to the civic arena, the marketplace, the natural world and the brothel, seems far removed from the mussarist movement or the chassidic traditions whose texts seem to hold more relevance for the holy days at hand.

But it would be a mistake to toss out modern Jewish literature, however impious, from the textual arsenal for repentance, renewal and redemption, although its trajectory is not straightforward.

Existential Aloneness

Twentieth century Jewish literature reflects the vertigo of a world where traditional values and authorities have given way, where the world has lost its centre. Endless possibilities beckon, endless pitfalls await. In place of the certainties of a universe saturated with religious meaning, there are only the meanings that humans struggle to create in our time and in our world, provisional and fragile. How distanced this seems from the image in the High Holy Day liturgy of the Shepherd who passes over His flock, determining the destiny of all humankind.

But the empty place where once there was a moral centre does not lead modern Jewish writers to celebrate an existence where all is permitted. Instead, the literature of the past century reflects a struggle to maintain a sense of meaningfulness and moral order. By dint of human effort, a moral centre holds.

Open to literary imagination

While writers acknowledge the danger of idolatry in such an attitude – humans worshiping only ourselves – what they emphasize is the imperative of human accountability. If we slip up, if we do not take up the responsibility that is ours alone, there is only the void.

Paradoxically, this inward focus of modern writers parallels the insistence on self-scrutiny in the High Holy Day liturgy. Whether existentially alone, or existentially alone before the Divine, we humans shape our destiny and infuse the world with meaningfulness through our actions and attitudes.

I do not mean to suggest that modern novels serve as vehicles for straightforward moral instruction, with characters providing "positive role models" who conform to religious and other norms of their community. Literature proceeds through indirection. We might say that literature follows the model of Tanach, where human beings, flawed and imperfect, rarely exemplify flawless and perfect behaviour.

In reading the Torah's narratives, we make our way through morally ambiguous or difficult situations, with people driven by passions – love for one's children, for one's spouse, for a "forbidden" person, or hatred for those same close relatives. While Abraham's exemplary hospitality is often cited as a model for Jews to imitate, more often, we do not learn directly from a character's behaviour, but from the structure of the narrative in which that behaviour is inscribed.

> If we slip up, if we do not take up the responsibility that is ours alone, there is only the void

The Torah, of course, has a governing moral vision that's not always present in contemporary literature. To the contrary. Literature hones in on pressure points, building on conflict and crisis. It compels us to imagine wildly, to drop our beliefs and habits and good sense, at least momentarily. It seduces us with words, fans our secret desires, tricks us into claiming parts of ourselves we prefer to deny.

I recently came upon a story about the Baal Shem Tov (or the Besht), the 18th-century mystic who is considered the founder of Chassidism, that struck me as emblemizing this aspect of literature. When the Besht was hired as a melamed, or tutor for some children, the children's father offered him a house that was thought to be invaded by "impure spirits." Despite its shady denizens, the Besht agreed to live in the house. According to the story, he "assigned the attic to the demons, God forbid, and when they [the demons] laughed, he scolded them and they became silent."

In this story, the Besht does not exorcise the demons, nor expel them from his house, nor destroy them. Instead, he shares his home with them, but without allowing them to take over. The story imagines a dynamic relationship between the Besht and the demons – one in which he hears their laughter, and then silences them – for a time.

We might think of these demons who dwell in the attic as parts of ourselves that we overtly repudiate – the parts of ourselves that literature often coaxes us into claiming. Like the Besht's demons, these aspects of self do not go away entirely. If unacknowledged, they may sit and sabotage what we do and who we like to be. But if we claim them, and we hear them, then – like the Besht – we may keep them in their proper place.

When I was a graduate student at Brandeis University, I had the privilege of studying with a brilliant professor of Hebrew literature named Yehuda Friedlander who was visiting from Bar-Ilan University. As a literature professor who was personally dati (observant), he was awake to the conflicting impulses of the religious and the literary sensibilities. During one class, he addressed his working through of this tension through an insightful reading of a verse in Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers).

"Rabbi Ya'akov omer, ha-m'halech baderech v'shoneh, umafsik mimishnato, v'omer 'ma na'eh ilan zeh,' 'ma na'eh nir zeh, ma'aleh,' alav ha-katuv k'ilu mit'chayev b'nafsho."

("Rabbi Yakov said: One who is walking along a path while learning, and interrupts his studying to say, 'How lovely is this tree!' or 'How lovely is this field!' Scripture regards him as though he was liable for his life [or, bears guilt for his soul]." (3:9)

In conventional readings, the verse in Pirkei Avot stands as a cautionary statement, a warning not to stray from learning, not to give way to the distractions of nature or anything else. But Prof. Friedlander understood it as warning against the allure not only of the beauty of nature, but of esthetics more broadly. Read in this way, the verse warned against the seductions of literature, and of any text that might compete with, and ultimately displace, the sacred one at hand.

Prof. Friedlander offered an alternate understanding for the ending of the verse. Rather than proclaiming the guilt of him who interrupts his study to contemplate beauty, he read the word mitchayev not as meaning "guilty" or "liable," but "responsible." Struck by beauty, opening oneself up to esthetic form and the literary imagination, one becomes chayav b'nafsho, responsible and answerable for his own soul, open to the perils of undoing, but also to the wondrous possibilities of renewal.

Prof. Sara Horowitz is director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies.

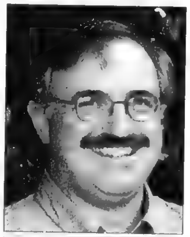
Renewing Commitment to the Hebrew language

"The Hebrew of your poets, Zion, is like oil upon a burn, cool as oil." Thus did American Jewish poet Charles Reznikoff begin the first poem in his volume Jerusalem the Golden, published in 1934 – with praise not for the language in which he composed his work, but instead for Hebrew. He ends on a personal note, with a lament: "Like Solomon, I have married and married the speech of strangers; none is like you, Shulamite."



By RABBI PERETZ RODMAN

Echoing the plaintive longing of a lover for his beloved as expressed in the Song of Songs, Reznikoff speaks for many modern Jews in bemoaning his detachment from the language that embodies not just the classical age of Jewish culture but the entire sweep of Jewish literature until modern times.

To call Hebrew a language "revived" or "reborn," as some have done, would be to invite a paraphrase of Mark Twain's quip that "reports of my death are greatly exaggerated."

Educated Jews throughout the ages were literate in the Hebrew of the Bible and the later Hebrew of rabbinic literature. Hebrew – sometimes with an admixture of Aramaic, its close cousin among Semitic languages – was the language of Torah learning and Jewish scholarship, with many new works written in Hebrew in every generation. From the earliest biblical legends to the vital journalism and belles lettres of the Jewish Enlightenment of the late 18th century and beyond, Hebrew was the medium in which Jewish culture thrived, even though it was no one's first language. Even works composed in other languages, such as the great philosophical works written by Sa'adia Gaon, Maimonides and Yehuda Halevi in Arabic, were preserved and studied among Jews worldwide in Hebrew translation.

Furthermore, many educated Jews could also cobble together a sentence or two of spoken Hebrew if they needed to do so in order to communicate with other Jews with whom they had no common spoken language, as we know from many medieval and modern sources. It was not ideology only that propelled Hebrew as the language of the renewed Jewish community of Eretz Yisrael in the late 19th century. Practical considerations alone had already caused Jews from vastly different parts of the world to choose Hebrew as a means of communication.

It is only in modern times, then, that one can find educated Jews – and even, most remarkably, Jews with a substantial education in Jewish culture and practice – for whom Hebrew remains very much a foreign language. Reznikoff's lament is a modern one.

Hebrew in modern Jewish life

For Jewish nationalists and for partisans of a modern secular Jewish culture, the restoration of Hebrew as the Jewish people's vernacular became a central pillar of their program for Jewish renewal. We have all heard of the efforts of Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, first in Europe and later in Jerusalem, to expand the vocabulary of Hebrew to meet contemporary needs and even to raise his own children as the first native speakers of Hebrew in many centuries.

Ben-Yehuda represents only the crest of a wave. In the wake of the efforts of his generation, European Jews as well as Jews in Palestine created a network of Hebrew-speaking schools and even of Hebrew-speaking teachers' colleges. The opening of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in 1925 can be seen as the pinnacle of those early efforts.

Those efforts were parallelled here in North America, most notably from the 1920s to the 1940s, by the founding of supplementary schools, summer camps and teachers colleges in which Hebrew was the medium of instruction, a movement then called "Ivrit b'Ivrit" ([teaching] Hebrew in Hebrew).

As Jewish day school education advanced in the 1950s, '60s and '70s from being a marginal phenomenon to providing the education for some of the core group of North American Jews, many of the principals and teachers who directed those schools and taught Jewish studies in them were alumni of those Hebraist institutions. Some had been trained in Europe, some in Israel, some in North America. Whether trained in Warsaw, Jerusalem or Cleveland, they shared a commitment to the primacy of the Hebrew language as the medium of instruction for Jewish learning.

The foundations of that commitment were practical as well as ideological. It was not only a sense of unity with the new Hebrew-speaking Jewish community of Eretz Yisrael that led the Hebraists to advocate teaching modern Hebrew. They understood that their students were not about to make aliyah in great numbers, and they were fully aware that the culture of modern Israel could not be a substitute for an attractive, creative, dynamic Jewish culture in the Diaspora. Their commitment to modern Hebrew was not only about Jewish unity over space; it was about Jewish continuity over time as well. Acquiring facility in modern Hebrew as a medium of communication is, they understood, the most efficient path to learning to read classical Hebrew, the language of the Bible and the post-biblical Jewish canon.

Desire to communicate motivates successful language learning

That insight was not at all obvious or intuitive, and the case for it must be made now as well. To do so, we need to take a look first at how people learn languages.

Language acquisition and Hebrew language instruction

People learn languages in one of two ways. They learn classical languages – Latin, Greek, Sanskrit – by formal study of grammar and vocabulary, and the goal of instruction is to learn to comprehend ancient texts. The method of instruction usually focuses on reading, whether aloud or silently, and translating passages from those texts. Alternatively, people learn modern languages by being exposed to their use to communicate messages, preferably in a controlled environment – that is, a classroom. The vocabulary, grammar and syntax of what is spoken or read begins with a very limited range, even a simplified version of the language, and progresses to a wider and wider circle of forms and words. To an extent, this characterizes the approach of the teachers of classical languages as well. The difference is the active use of the new language in the modern language classroom.

New immigrants to Israel in the 1980's learn Hebrew.

The mental processes that we use to acquire facility in a modern language as a medium of communication are not the same as those we employ when studying a classical language, and the skills that foster success in one are not all the same skills that move us ahead in the other. Most people have an innate desire to communicate, and it is that drive that motivates most successful language learners.

Ivrit b'Ivrit advocates (and their counterparts among many European ethnic groups trying to foster the use of their minority languages) understood intuitively what researchers in applied linguistics have since realized and analyzed: one acquires a language through use, not by the study of its grammar, syntax and vocabulary. Having children put on plays in Hebrew, sing in Hebrew and discuss school subjects in Hebrew would be a far more efficient means of teaching than the old grammar-and-translation method that served to educate their parents and grandparents, and it would tap into their natural motivations.

Familiarity with past and present essential for Jewish culture

Hebrew, an ancient language, has changed and grown over the centuries, but the degree to which some of its main features have remained the same is remarkable. The basic vocabulary of modern Hebrew is drawn directly from the Bible and rabbinic literature. Even more striking is the continuity in word formation: the way that nouns and verbs are shaped has changed very little over 3,000 years. As a result, Israeli schoolchildren can begin their study of Tanach (the Hebrew Bible) in the primary grades, with no need for more than a few tips on how to "convert" some of the archaic verb forms into their modern equivalents.

It is this closeness of modern Hebrew to its biblical and post-biblical antecedents on which the Ivrit b'Ivrit advocates seek to capitalize. Their bet is that the most effective and efficient way to prepare people to read classical Hebrew texts is to teach them to communicate in modern Hebrew, and from there, to make the relatively minor transition to understanding classical strata of the language.

Jewish continuity, Jewish creativity

Familiarity with the texts of the past is not the only goal of Jewish education. From the most traditionalist to the most radical, every Jewish group wants its adherents to create, to innovate, to move further and deeper than previous generations. Orthodox and "ultra-Orthodox" Jews want their students not merely to understand Torah and its traditional interpretation, they want to hear chiddushim – new interpretations, new insights. Conservative and liberal Jews want their students to question, to evaluate, to choose and to create new forms and new religious practices. Zionists want their students not merely to admire Israel, but to live in it and help build it, to be active contributors to a developing culture.

> The use of English in the Hebrew language classroom should be at a bare minimum

For all of them, though, familiarity with the past and present is the essential basis for being able to carry Jewish culture forward. For the Jewish tradition more than most, cultural literacy is primarily textual knowledge. That knowledge is immediate and direct only for those who have reading comprehension skills in Hebrew. If the main road to that goal is through the medium of modern Hebrew, spoken and written, heard and read, then we must all examine how well our educational institutions pursue that path.

Hebrew in school, Hebrew at camp

When your children's school tells you they are teaching Hebrew, the first question to ask is: which Hebrew? The second is: which skills? Does the school's plan for Hebrew instruction delineate whether communicative proficiency in modern Hebrew is one of its goals? If it is not, can the school administration and your child's Hebrew teacher tell you clearly whether the goals include teaching children to comprehend (not just phonetically decode into sounds) written biblical Hebrew, or the Hebrew of the siddur, or the Hebrew of rabbinic literature? If the school and the teacher are not clear about their goals, little is likely to be accomplished.

If the school claims indeed to be teaching modern Hebrew, how is that instruction carried out? Does the teacher speak Hebrew in class? Are children speaking Hebrew, or just reading aloud? Are children active as they learn, acting and playing and creating, or are they in their seats throughout each lesson? An active, engaging atmosphere in which students are free to try new expressions and even make linguistic errors is preferable to one in which students are largely passive, and the use of English in the Hebrew language classroom should be at a bare minimum.

One reason we can be optimistic about the future of Hebrew language knowledge among Jews worldwide is that several of the leading private foundations that sponsor innovations in Jewish education have begun to invest in upgrading the teaching of Hebrew in Jewish schools. The AVI CHAI foundation funds the comprehensive NETA curriculum initiative for Jewish high schools. NETA, founded by Hilla Kobliner, a visionary Hebrew instructor from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and based at Hebrew College in Newton, Mass., supplements its curriculum with mandatory teacher education and objective, outside exams to upgrade the skills of instructors and teachers and provide comparative measurements of success.

AVI CHAI also helps fund an important Canadian curriculum initiative for modern Hebrew language instruction in elementary and middle school grades, the TaL-AM curriculum spearheaded by Tova Shimon of Montreal's Bronfman Jewish Education Centre. TaL-AM provides teachers with training in the use of the extensive materials provided to the teachers and students: games, songs and activities, as well as a series of textbooks. Furthermore, AVI CHAI supports a summer program at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York for upgrading the Hebrew skills of day school teachers.

The Jim Joseph Foundation, based in San Francisco, enabled the Union for Reform Judaism to develop an elementary school Hebrew curriculum for Reform day schools that is now used in a number of community schools across North America. That curriculum deserves further support and development. A new, privately funded initiative to promote the teaching of Hebrew for communicative proficiency in North American day schools is taking shape now as well.

With those curriculum initiatives well under way, teacher training now lags behind all other aspects of the field. Only a handful of academic programs anywhere in the world prepare their students to be teachers of Hebrew language. Brandeis University's Hebrew language program, under the leadership of Dr. Vardit Ringvald, has developed a degree program. At some other universities, too, that offer a degree in Hebrew language and literature (as distinct from Jewish studies), one can be a Hebrew major and train as a foreign language teacher. In Canada, students at Toronto's York University and Montreal's McGill University can receive specific training as day school teachers of Jewish studies in a program that offers Hebrew language courses and even Jewish studies courses taught in Hebrew, enabling them to carry on the tradition of Jewish studies instruction in Hebrew in Canada's day schools. The Hebrew University of Jerusalem also trains teachers of Hebrew as a foreign language.

None of these programs draws more than a small number of students, and together they do not begin to provide enough trained professionals to fill the positions that become available each year.

Some Jewish summer camps make an effort to use modern Hebrew in the daily life of campers and counsellors. They face some practical difficulties, with a scarcity of Hebrew-speaking North American staff members foremost among these. Their most intractable difficulty, though, is the effort to convince all their constituencies – parents, counsellors and, to a lesser extent, campers – that kids can get along and have a good time while immersed in an unfamiliar language, and that the effort to provide that immersion is worthwhile.

Hebrew at home

Those of us who learned a fair amount of Hebrew in our schools and camps and during shorter or longer stays in Israel now have many more opportunities than ever before to use our Hebrew and improve our skills. Two decades ago, we had to wait for onionskin copies of Israeli weekend newspapers to arrive by air mail from Tel Aviv. Then, until a decade ago, we had to rely on North American printings of those newspapers. Today, we have gone beyond just those newspapers, which are now available online and which feature talk-back opportunities to post responses to news items… in Hebrew. We can live-stream Israeli radio, watch Israeli television on our cable and satellite TV feeds, and access Israeli television shows on the Internet. Israeli films can be found at our local libraries and video stores. Hebrew books can be ordered online. One can even look up unfamiliar words in online Hebrew-English dictionaries.

> Modern Jews have always been 'early adopters' of new technologies

For anyone who has not yet acquired a working knowledge of modern Hebrew, a private corporation in Israel offers formal lessons in modern Hebrew online. At least one American college offers Hebrew language courses online, too, offering course credit for those who are interested. There are many on-campus programs as well, at ulpanim, colleges and universities in North American cities.

Hebrew in Israel

The most obvious change, and the most dramatic, in the status of Hebrew in Jewish life in the Diaspora is the existence of an entire Hebrew-speaking society in Eretz Yisrael. No better immersion could be imagined than to be among native speakers of Hebrew, listening to their speech, talking with them, reading road signs and billboards and bumper stickers, and writing notes to your neighbours, all in Hebrew. It is true that one can manage to get around in Israel today speaking and reading only English, but it is also worth discovering that Israelis are complimented when visitors make an effort to communicate in Hebrew and make an effort to be patient and helpful. Be persistent when they switch to English. They may think of English as a high-status language compared to their own minor Middle Eastern tongue, but you may find that they will accept your reticence about switching to English and speak Hebrew or switch between the two languages.

Israel is not only a living classroom for students of Hebrew, though. It is also a country and society different from that of Canadian Jews. Students of any language are affected by the way they view native speakers and their culture, and North American Jews have complex and ambivalent feelings toward Israelis. They often find Israelis direct and aggressive rather than, as they might prefer, subtle and understated. Those with a Zionist upbringing may feel negatively about someone who has left Israel to live in North America. Others may find "secular" Israelis so divorced from traditional Jewish behaviours and cultural references that they feel little kinship with them. All those attitudes and feelings are the background against which we need to understand and measure North American Jews' attitudes toward the Hebrew language and toward the Israeli teachers they encounter in their classrooms.

Jewish renaissance

The technology of communications has empowered us to build a worldwide language group that transcends the boundaries of nation-states. Modern Jews have always been "early adopters" of new technologies, at least in pursuit of prosperity. Can we do the same in pursuit of cultural continuity? If we can raise the level of Hebrew proficiency and Hebrew literacy among Jews worldwide, we will be strengthening Jewish unity and Jewish cultural vitality in Canada, in the worldwide Jewish community and in Israel.

Renewing Zionism

(This essay appears as the foreword in New Essays on Zionism, recently published by the Shalem Centre in Jerusalem.)

By YORAM HAZONY

Though Jews have always lived in their historical homeland, it was not until the second half of the 20th century that a large part of the Jewish people returned to settle in the land of Israel. There they built major cities – Tel Aviv, Haifa, Be'er Sheva, and Jerusalem – a social and economic infrastructure, national institutions of culture and education, and a democratic system of government. They also built a sovereign state, the State of Israel, created in 1948 and subsequently recognized by most nations of the world. Today, Israel is home to the world's largest Jewish community. It maintains a vibrant free press, a diverse and dynamic culture, and a powerful citizen army. After 2,000 years of statelessness, the Jewish people have achieved a vital national home.

Should this state exist? Does this small, precariously positioned Jewish state have a moral, political, or religious significance that can justify the hardship involved in maintaining it, in defending it? And if it has such significance, is this something that can speak to non-Jews as well, or is it a matter of concern only to Jews?

There was a time when such questions seemed pressing. Throughout the 19th century, the idea of a Jewish state was invoked time and again, usually by Jews whose purpose was to emphasize that their people had long ago abandoned the dream of establishing a state of their own. Jewry had become a faith, they argued, and no longer harboured political aspirations that might stand in the way of their integration into the public life of Germany, Austria, France, England, or America. Later, at century's end, the tide turned. Resurgent anti-Semitism spread across Europe, in response to which arose the Zionist Organization in 1897. Under the leadership of a Viennese journalist named Theodor Herzl, this organization set out to establish the very Jewish state that many European Jews had insisted they did not want. From that time until the German invasion of Poland in the fall of 1939, the question of the importance of the Jewish state haunted the public life of the Jews the world over. Many felt that the future of the Jewish people hinged on the answer that was given to this question. History proved them correct.

In May 1948, the Zionist leader David Ben-Gurion declared the Jewish settlement in Palestine an independent Jewish state. A tiny minority of Jews still opposed this step, but by this point their influence on Jewish opinion had become negligible. It had become clear that even a weak Jewish regime in Palestine, in the years before and during the war, would have been able to rescue hundreds of thousands of Jews who perished, perhaps even millions. The Holocaust had persuaded nearly all Jews of the necessity of a Jewish state. Even the Communists and the Haredi Orthodox Agudat Israel, which had historically been opponents of the state, became signatories in the declaration of Israel's independence. The same was true among gentile friends of the Jews, most of who likewise came to think that the need for a Jewish state was self-evident.

The matter, it seemed, was settled. For nearly a generation, Jews and those who sympathized with their cause treated ideological opposition to the idea of a Jewish state as a marginal phenomenon, the province of a few anti-Semites and cranks. When in 1975, the General Assembly of the United Nations equated Zionism (i.e., the existence of a Jewish state) with racism, the declaration was dismissed in the free world as a hypocritical manoeuvre on the part of Communist and Arab dictatorships to defame a democratic country and the West in general. Jews now recognized that ideological opposition to the idea of a Jewish state could be turned into an intellectual truncheon in the hands of despots and terrorists not overly troubled by what had happened in

Anti-Zionist propaganda's fearsome toll

World War II. But the possibility that such ideas could gain currency among decent people of goodwill remained inconceivable.

But the times have quickly changed, and what was inconceivable only yesterday has become reality. With the collapse of the Soviet Union, one can now give voice to anti-Zionist ideas without associating oneself with totalitarianism; and with the rise of a generation that has no memory of the Holocaust, the old taboos against such ideas are falling throughout the western world and even among Jews. Controversial Israeli policies in Lebanon, in the West Bank, and in Gaza have exposed the state to widespread criticism, facilitating the task of those who question its right to exist. In Europe, overt anti-Semitism has made a feverish re-appearance, for which hostility towards Israel serves as an all too effective cover. In North America, a generation of anti-Zionist propaganda – originally fanned by the Soviets, but now a part of mainstream discourse in the mass media and on university campuses – has taken a fearsome toll, with many young Jews withdrawing their support for Zionism entirely. In Israel, too, a new generation of academics and writers has placed the criticism of Zionism and of the idea of the Jewish state at the centre of their intellectual agenda, ravaging both the historical and the philosophical basis for the state.

Is it important that there be a Jewish state? It is now evident that this matter is not settled at all. The majority of Jews and their friends may still offer instinctive and unthinking support for the idea of the Jewish state. But with increasing frequency, one hears the voices of Jews and non-Jews whose answer to this question is in the negative. As Prof. Adi Ophir of Tel Aviv University has put it:

"Jewish sovereignty has turned out to be the biggest danger to Jewish cultural and moral existence… They tell us that the only question left open, the only real question, is how to get 'peace'… They fail to realize that the question lies in the very idea of national sovereignty… We envision a state that will not be a [Jewish] nation state."

There are many who seem to believe that the only answer to the accelerating delegitimization of Zionism both in Jewish and non-Jewish circles is to ignore it. No other nation in the world, it is said, is required to justify its existence. The English or the French, for example, do not have to explain to themselves or to others why they should have their sovereign states. They simply exist, leading their lives without explanation, without justification, as do all other peoples.

Perhaps there was a time when this view made sense. During the Cold War, when the United States and the Soviet Union were locked in a relentless competition for the loyalty of various peoples around the globe, self-determination and political independence seemed to be the way of the world, for the Jews as for everyone else. But the world in which one might have reached this conclusion is now gone. In its place is one in which the system of sovereign states is challenged by a quickly rising European ideology that sees the future of mankind in the dissolution of state sovereignty. The classic European national states – England, France, Holland, Italy, Germany – appear to be in the process of giving up their independence, choosing instead to lose themselves in a great European state whose ideological commitment is to something akin to world government. The fact that the French or the Germans do not seem overly concerned with justifying their continued existence as politically independent nations is thus hardly a precedent that Jews should rush to embrace. Indeed, it is the Europeans' manifest disinterest in such questions that makes it possible to imagine that these nations will no longer exist as politically independent states a few years from now.

David Ben-Gurion speaks with new immigrants to Israel in the early 1950's. The ingathering of exiles was a pre-eminent purpose of Zionism. Now Zionism and that purpose are being questioned.

Moreover, Israel is not watching events in Europe unfold through a telescope. We often forget that the Jewish state is, in terms of its geography, a province of Europe. Israeli cultural figures spend a great deal of time hopping planes to Paris and Berlin, moving in precisely those circles in which the dismantling of the national state is seen as a moral imperative. The extraordinary outpouring of "post-national" sentiment in Israel in the three decades since the 1973 Yom Kippur War – climaxing in the 1990s with the demands to change the national anthem, the flag, the Law of Return, and virtually every other aspect of Israeli public life that makes it a Jewish state – was thus not merely a homegrown expression of a desire to tone down the passion of Jewish national life in the hope of bringing the Arab-Israeli conflict to an end. It was at least as much an expression of a desire to "make it" in Europe

Skepticism calls for revival of Jewish national sentiment

by mothballing most of the old Jewish concerns and embracing what might be called the European Dream: A social-welfare system capable of guaranteeing a high standard of living for all, and assimilation into the machinery of world government. As Yossi Beilin, one of the leading architects of this new Israel, put it:

"My dream is that Israel should be a kind of Denmark or Norway of the Middle East… What I would like to see is a country with a powerful economy, whose citizens have a high standard of living… I see Israel becoming one of the most important countries in the UN, a country involved in resolving the conflicts of others, with the ability to contribute officials to the UN, including a UN secretary general whose focus would be on questions of human rights."

Of course, the last few years have not been kind to this dream. The terrible bloodshed that has visited Israel since the resumption of warfare with the Palestinian Authority in September 2000 and with the Second Lebanon War in 2006 has, to be sure, made it implausible that the Jewish state will soon be able to spare soldiers for UN peacekeeping missions. Moreover, the international reaction to the killing of over 1,000 Jewish civilians in the streets of Tel Aviv and Jerusalem has taught us a hard lesson about post-national Europe, which is well disposed to Jews when they seem to be progressing towards the European Dream, but is also capable of shocking outbursts of anti-Semitism the moment they are seen wielding military power in an attempt to defend themselves. This, too, has played a role in sharpening Jewish skepticism concerning the virtues claimed for the new identity Europe is building for itself.

This widespread and deepening skepticism has opened the way for a revival of Jewish national sentiment – of Zionism – both in Israel and in the Jewish Diaspora. The purpose of this anthology of essays [to which this essay is a foreword] is to begin a discussion whose ultimate purpose is to provide the intellectual framework for such a revival.

It is no secret that Zionism as an intellectual movement is believed by many to have spent itself. Zionist thought is typically depicted as though it came to an end with the founding of the state in 1948, or was then succeeded by the platforms of the various political parties. But this view of the history of Zionist thought is mistaken. There were always individuals who continued to contribute to the store of constructive thought concerning the nature, meaning and purpose of the Jewish state, even as this kind of writing was marginalized in favour of ever-more aggressive "critiques" of Zionism that were, in the 1970s, to become the hallmark of high Israeli culture. The Zionist writings of Nathan Rotenstreich, Eliezer Schweid, Eliezer Berkovits, and Yosef Dov Soloveitchik are among the significant exceptions to this trend.

It is not until the mid-1990s, however, that one can point to a real revival of the classical trend in Zionist thought. This, of course, was precisely the moment when the general distancing of Israel's intellectual culture from traditional Zionist presuppositions reached its height. Not since the 1930s had Zionism come under such systematic criticism from what could be considered the mainstream of Jewish opinion. In particular, this rupture with the Zionist political tradition was symbolized by the nearly complete delegitimization of the term "Jewish state," coined by Herzl and incorporated by Ben-Gurion into Israel's Declaration of Independence.

The revival of Zionist thought in Israel in the mid-1990s can be described as consisting of two different types of material. In the first place, there is what can be called controversial material, most of it written by the older generation of Labor-Zionist academics and other writers born before the establishment of the state, including the authors Aharon Meged and Moshe Shamir, historians such as Shabtai Teveth, Yehoshua Porath, Yosef Gorny, and Anita Shapira, the political scientists Shlomo Avineri and Shlomo Aharonson, and the sociologist Moshe Lissak. These responses were in effect a counter-critique, whose purpose was to highlight various flaws perceived in the works of many of the prominent critics of Zionism.

In addition, there was what may be called constructive material, whose purpose was not so much to set up a counter-critique, as to offer a philosophical and historiographic alternative capable of reviving the Zionist political tradition and serving as the basis for a renewed and deeper appreciation of Zionism and of the Jewish state. Here, the tendency was to prefer essays and larger expositions, most of them composed by younger writers who were at the time largely unknown. In this category one may include the writings of historians such as Tuvia Frieling, Tzvi Tzameret, Alex Yakobson, and Arie Morgenstern, political and legal theorists such as Amnon Rubinstein, Ruth Gavison, Eyal Chowers, Ofir Haivry, Daniel Polisar, David Hazony, and Assaf Sagiv, and scholars and essayists such as Anna Isakova, Ze'ev Maghen, and Assaf Inbari.

The full inventory of controversial and constructive works that can be associated with this trend would by this point extend to many volumes. For this reason, we have decided not to include in this anthology those writings whose purpose was largely counter-critique of post-national trends in Israel. Instead, we have tried to focus on constructive works that may prove to be of enduring worth. Our hope is that these new essays on Zionism will prove to be as provocative and fruitful to Jews in the Diaspora as they were when originally published in Israel.

Growing radical-moderate rift in Mideast produced promise and peril for Israel

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

The Jewish year 5767 saw a widening of the rift between moderates and radicals in the Middle East, which in turn produced a paradox for Israel: the rift heightened both a chance for peace between Israel and the moderates and a threat of war between Israel and the radicals.

The year also saw dramatic developments in Israeli domestic politics: Prime Minister Ehud Olmert struggled to hold onto power in the wake of a scathing report on his performance in the second Lebanon war; former Prime Minister Ehud Barak was re-elected leader of the Labor Party; and President Moshe Katsav was forced to resign over a sex scandal.

The defining event for Israeli-Palestinian ties was the bitter Gaza Strip showdown between Fatah-led moderates and Hamas-led radicals. In a week of cruel fighting in June 2007, Hamas forces crushed their Fatah rivals, carrying out summary executions, parading ill-clad captives and hurling rival militiamen from rooftops.

The end result was Hamas in sole control of Gaza, but supplanted in government by a new Fatah-led administration under President Mahmoud Abbas and Prime Minister Salam Fayyad. The Abbas government was ensconced in the West Bank, operating from Ramallah in the name of all Palestinians and recognized by Israel and most of the international community. Ironically, Fatah's defeat in Gaza made it possible for Israel to circumvent the radicals and deal directly with the moderates in Ramallah.

Israel, the United States and the Arab moderates were quick to size up the peacemaking potential in the new situation. On June 25, just 10 days after the Hamas takeover in Gaza, the leaders of Egypt, Jordan and Israel came together with moderate West Bank Palestinians to launch a new Israeli-Palestinian peace initiative at a summit in the Egyptian resort town of Sharm el-Sheik.

Three weeks later, in a major policy statement, U.S. President George Bush called for a regional peace parley, under American auspices, to be attended by Washington's moderate Middle Eastern allies.

In early August, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice visited the region to set up the peace meeting and make sure key players like the Saudis would participate. Rice repeated her insistence that Israel and the Palestinians deal with core issues – borders, refugees and Jerusalem – for a final peace deal.

In the wake of her visit, Olmert and Abbas began a series of meetings designed to produce a framework for a final-status agreement to be presented at the regional meeting. Palestinian spokesmen, impressed by the show of American resolve, said that for the first time in years they believed the establishment of a Palestinian state was possible.

There were other reasons for optimism: former British Prime Minister Tony Blair, a highly respected mediator, entered the arena, and Israel and moderate Arab states agreed to negotiate on the basis of a peace plan reaffirmed by the Arab League in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia in March 2007.

But with Hamas in control in Gaza, there were questions as to how far Abbas could go in peacemaking with Israel. He also was under considerable Arab pressure to reconcile with Hamas, along the lines of a power-sharing agreement the two sides had reached in Mecca in February.

Moreover, as the United States stepped up its efforts to promote a more stable regional order, Iran and its radical allies moved to undermine it.

IDF failed to win decisive victory

Iran smuggled rockets through Syria, earmarked for its Hezbollah proxy in Lebanon, replenishing stocks depleted in the fighting with Israel the previous summer. It also reportedly helped bankroll large weapons deals between Syria and Russia.

In mid-July, when Syrian President Bashar Assad again sounded peace overtures to Israel, Iran's President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad flew to Damascus to make sure nothing would come of them. While in the Syrian capital, Ahmadinejad warned of a "hot summer" in which the enemies of Islam would be defeated.

Iran also trained and armed Hamas fighters, helping them overcome Fatah in Gaza. According to Israeli intelligence, the Iranian aim was to surround Israel with a missile cordon from Tehran to Gaza, primarily to deter any Israeli pre-emptive strike against Iran's nuclear weapons program.

To offset growing Iranian power, the United States planned huge arms supply packages to its moderate allies: $20 billion in sales to Saudi Arabia over the coming decade; $13 billion in military aid to Egypt; and $30 billion to Israel.

Bush assured Olmert during a visit to Washington in June that the Saudi weapons would not be deployed close to the Israeli border and that the United States remained committed to maintaining Israel's technological edge.

Following the poor performance of its ground forces in the second Lebanon war, Israel decided on heavier military spending of its own. In late July, the government allocated an additional $11 billion for the next 10 years. Some of it would be devoted to enhancing Israel's long-range strike capacity and some to enlarging the ground forces by two divisions.

The Israel Defence Forces' failure to win a decisive victory in the war cost Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen Dan Halutz and Defence Minister Amir Peretz their jobs. Halutz, an air force man, was replaced in mid-February by Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, a seasoned infantry and armor commander. Peretz, after losing the leadership of the Labor Party to Barak in June, was ousted at defence by the former prime minister.

Throughout the year, Olmert had been under fire for his widely perceived mismanagement of the campaign against Hezbollah. After the Winograd Commission, set up to investigate the war, added its harsh criticism in late April, his approval rating plummeted to less than three percent and most pundits believed he would be forced to resign.

But Olmert displayed considerable political skill. In the report's immediate aftermath, he moved quickly inside his own Kadima Party to nip in the bud a potential leadership bid by Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni. Six months earlier, in October 2006, he had greatly strengthened his chances of political survival by bringing Avigdor Lieberman's far-right Yisrael Beiteinu Party into the governing coalition.

In the short-term, his inclusion of the experienced Barak as defence minister strengthened his hand still further. But Kadima colleagues warned Olmert that in Labor's Barak he was riding a tiger that would soon turn on him.

Olmert was not the only Israeli leader in trouble in 5767. Katsav was forced to resign his presidency in late June after being accused of sex offences against several women who had worked with him. In January, Attorney General Menachem Mazuz indicated that he had sufficient evidence to indict Katsav on rape charges against at least one of the 11 complainants.

Economy performed extremely well

But in June, Mazuz agreed to a plea bargain under which Katsav, who professed his innocence throughout, would confess to lesser charges and receive a six-month suspended sentence. The plea bargain sparked a wave of public protest and petitions to the High Court of Justice demanding that Katsav be put on trial.

As part of the plea bargain, Katsav resigned on June 29, just two weeks before his term was due to end. He was succeeded as president on July 15 by Shimon Peres, the 83-year-old former prime minister.

The unpopular plea bargain compounded the problems faced by the country's legal system, where the new justice minister, Daniel Friedmann, seemed to be waging a calculated campaign against the Supreme Court and its president, Dorit Beinisch.

Before his appointment in February, Friedmann had complained that the court had grown too "activist," and that its unelected members were encroaching on what were rightly legislative and executive functions. His critics warned that in weakening the court, Friedmann would be undermining one of the most important pillars of Israeli democracy.

Despite the second Lebanon war and the increased defence spending, the Israeli economy performed extremely well over the past year. Growth remained robust at more than 4 per cent, compared to 5.1 per cent in 2006.

Unemployment was down from 8.4 percent to 7.8 per cent, and the gross domestic product per capita was estimated at over $20,000. Inflation, below zero in 2006, was expected to rise to the projected government figure of between two per cent and three per cent, although there were worrisome signs that it might go higher.

Foreign investment was expected to grow by eight per cent to $15.3 billion in 2007, and the Tel Aviv stock market, despite a major wobble in August, outperformed those of the rich Western industrial nations.

Threats and opportunities dot landscape for European Jewry

By DINAH A. SPRITZER
JTA

PRAGUE — For European Jewry, it was a year of the good, the bad and the ugly.

The good: the election of a French president seen as sympathetic to Israel, the opening of new Jewish institutions, and increased opportunities for Jews from eastern countries that have joined the European Union.

The bad: boycotts and threats of boycotts boiled over in England, with fears that similar anti-Israel efforts would spread elsewhere in Europe.

The ugly: alarming levels of anti-Semitism. Several organizations and individual country reports revealed a marked rise of anti-Semitic incidents across Western Europe in the second half of 2006.

These incidents were primarily the result of the prolonged negative reaction in Europe to Israel's two-month war against Hezbollah in Lebanon last summer, say observers.

The mood in Europe was stoked by media coverage "that was one-sided, focused only on Lebanese casualties and implicated Jews in general," said Ilan Moss, political counsellor for the Paris-based European Jewish Gongress.

In Britain, the Community Security Trust reported the highest number of anti-Semitic incidents since it began monitoring in 1984, with a 60 per cent increase in the second half of the year. In France, the country's main secular Jewish umbrella organization, CRIF, recorded a 24 per cent rise in anti-Jewish incidents in general, and a 45 per cent increase in violent incidents.

There was also an upsurge in anti-Semitic attitudes, according to research conducted by the Anti-Defamation League in May. The ADL found that 44 per cent of those surveyed in France, Poland, Germany, Italy and Spain agreed with the statement that "Jews have too much power in international financial markets," while 39 per cent believed "Jews have too much power in the business world."

Human Rights First, a U.S.-based non-governmental organization, took European governments to task in June for their lack of a coherent response to the problem of anti-Semitism and xenophobia.

"Today the parallels with the 1930s include the seeming indifference of many governments and broad sectors of public opinion to the rising violence and fear that once again threatens European Jews, and with them members of other minorities," said the Human Rights First report.

In many of the countries where anti-Semitic violence was on the rise; the perpetrators, according to police, were of Arab descent.

"This year made it even clearer that in the coming years, the issue of minority coexistence is one of the greatest challenges of the continent," said Tomer Orni, executive vice president of the London-based European Council of Jewish Communities.

As communities press governments for greater security and programs to better combat anti-Semitism, Moss said Jewish leaders are also focused on the boycott of Israel proposed by Britain's largest teachers' union. The University and College Union voted May 30 to consider an academic boycott of Israeli universities.

Almost immediately after the UCU move, the country's largest trade union decided to consider a boycott motion at its upcoming conference. While UCU represents 120,000 members, UNISON has more than one million. Another proposed boycott by a British journalists' union was ultimately rejected.

"We are worried about these kind of boycotts spreading throughout Europe. We don't sees it as directly anti-Semitic, but since there are no such boycotts against any other country in the world, you have to wonder about the motives," said Serge Cwajgenbaum, the EJC's general-secretary.

As always, European policy toward Iran and the Middle East was a source of concern for Jewish leaders, Cwajgenbaum noted.

The European Union was a faithful member of the Quartet, the international body seeking resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict that also includes the United States, Russia and the United Nations. The Quartet has agreed to isolate Hamas until it renounces terrorism and recognizes Israel's right to exist, but there were signs that some EU member states wanted a softer position on Hamas, on funding for Palestinians in general and a tougher line on Israel.

On July 10, for instance, European foreign ministers, led by France, posted an open letter in the French daily Le Monde calling for Israel to make more concessions for peace.

But there were other political developments in Europe that gave Jews a hopeful outlook.

In France, home to Europe's largest Jewish population, a president viewed by most as sympathetic to Jewish and Israeli causes took office in May.

French Jewry supported Nicolas Sarkozy

Nicolas Sarkozy, a right-leaning centrist whose grandfather was Jewish, received overwhelming support from the country's Jewish voters, according to JTA interviews. Many applauded his tough stance against anti-Semitism in his previous post as interior minister.

Sarkozy was and is widely expected to be more sympathetic to Israel's need to protect itself from Palestinian aggression than his long-serving predecessor, Jacques Chirac.

As commentator Frederic Encel put it, Sarkozy is "by far the most pro-Israeli French presidential figure Israel could have hoped for. However, in the long term, some analysts observed that Sarkozy has in the past supported closer ties between France and Syria, which might mean increased pressure on Israel to evacuate the Golan Heights in return for a peace deal with Syria.

In Germany, Chancellor Angela Merkel continued to reinforce her reputation as a champion of Jewish and Israeli causes.

"We will fight the new anti-Semitism along with the old. Germany and the European Union are committed to the security of the citizens of Israel," she said on a visit to Jerusalem's Yad Vashem Holocaust Memorial in April.

The most heated political event among Jewish communities in 5767 was the election of the Russian Jewish Congress president, Moshe Kantor, to the helm of the European Jewish Congress.

Kantor, the first Eastern European elected to the post of EJC chair, beat the French incumbent Pierre Besnainou in May, with support from a wide majority of the delegates representing 41 European Jewish communities.

Kantor recently made his first trip as EJC president to Israel, where he was warmly welcomed by Israeli politicians, including Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, despite lingering concerns that his closeness to the Kremlin will keep him from speaking out against Russian President Vladimir Putin's support of Iran's nuclear program or his soft stance on Hamas, whose leaders Putin welcomed to Moscow.

Kantor's election was viewed by many of Europe's communities as uniting EJC, which has previously shown the strain of battles between East and West.This tension was reflected within a single European capital: Berlin's Jewish community split this year as a new group was formed in response to the growing influence of Jews from the former Soviet Union.

After months of angry exchanges pitting Albert Meyer, an attorney and former president of the Berlin Jewish community, against representatives of the new Russian majority, Meyer announced in mid-April that he had joined with historian Julius Schoeps to form a breakaway group.

Ultimately, observers say, the split is about the need for new power structures in the German Jewish community, which has quadrupled to more than 120,000 since 1990 with the collapse of the Soviet Union.

Within Europe, meanwhile, greater unity was heralded among Jews as Romania and Bulgaria were accepted Jan. 1 into the now 27-member European Union.

For Jews, about 8,000 in Bulgaria and 15,000 in Romania, the move means greater hope for the future as their economies strengthen and they can obtain jobs at home, or work abroad without barriers.

"We have negative aliyah – young people who were already in Israel are coming back to Bulgaria because the economic situation is improving," said Emil Kahlo, a former president of Shalom, the largest Jewish organization in Bulgaria.

There were other large celebratory occasions for European Jewry.

Coexistence with resurgence of anti-Semitism

The Ohel Jakob synagogue and community centre was inaugurated in Munich on the symbolic date of Nov. 9, the 68th anniversary of Kristallnacht, Hitler's terrible release of anti-Jewish violence in the same city and across Germany.

Also last November, a Holocaust survivor from Munich, Charlotte Knobloch, officially was elected as head of the Central Council of Jews in Germany after assuming the post several months earlier, following the death of her predecessor, Paul Spiegel.

Next door in Poland, Jews in February heralded the renovation and re-opening of the Yeshiva Chachmei Lublin, the largest yeshiva in Europe before World War II. Members of Poland's small Jewish community hope the 1930s building and synagogue will attract tourist groups, worshippers and religious students from around the world.

And as a sign of the diversity of even Poland's small Jewish community, Rabbi Burt Schuman of New York was installed as Poland's first full-time Progressive rabbi at Beit Warszawa last October

In May, the Museum of the History of Polish Jews broke ground in Warsaw. To be completed in 2009, the museum will be the largest Jewish institution of its kind in Europe, commemorating the 1,000 years of history of what was the largest Jewish community in Europe before World War II.

But in Poland as elsewhere in Europe, Jewish life coexisted with the ugly resurgence of anti-Semitic incidents and attitudes.

A Polish member of the European Parliament, Maciej Giertych, published a pamphlet in February that said Jews were unethical, unable to integrate into society and a "tragic community" because they don't accept Jesus as the messiah.

A controversial Polish Catholic priest continued to attract condemnation after allegedly making anti-Semitic remarks. Tadeusz Rydzyk, founder of the Catholic Radio Station Radio Maryja, was quoted by Wprost magazine in July as calling Jews greedy and criticizing Polish President Lech Kaczynski for supporting the establishment of the Museum of the History of Polish Jews. Rydzyk, whose radio station has a history of anti-Semitic commentary, was later welcomed by Pope Benedict XVI at his summer residence outside of Rome, much to the chagrin of Jewish groups.

Rosh Hashanah Greetings 5768

5767 was a year of transition for U.S. Jewry

By AMI EDEN
JTA

Too often the High Holy Days process of reflecting on the year gone by can produce a frustratingly vanilla verdict: not much has changed.

But thanks to former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, gay-friendly rabbis and deep-pocketed donors, the Hebrew year 5767 turned out to be a time of major transition for the American Jewish community.

Arguably the most pronounced and alarming development was the mainstream frontal assault on the pro-Israel activism of Jewish organizations, led by Carter in conjunction with the November release of his book Palestine: Peace Not Apartheid.

Published by Simon & Schuster, the book reflects the former president's longstanding sympathy for the Palestinian cause and belief that Israeli settlements are the main obstacle to peace.

But this time around, in his book and on his book tour, Carter also took aim at the pro-Israel lobby and Jewish organizations, accusing them of conspiring to stifle debate over America's foreign policy. Plenty of fringe figures have pressed this argument in the past, but suddenly this past year a former president of the United States was leading the charge, with several other respectable figures right behind him.

"This reluctance to criticize any policies of the Israeli government is because of the extraordinary lobbying efforts of the American-Israel Political Action Committee and the absence of any significant contrary voices," Carter wrote in a Dec. 8 opinion piece in the Los Angeles Times, shortly after the release of his book. He was incorrectly referring to AIPAC, the American Israel Public Affairs Committee.

"It would be almost politically suicidal for members of Congress to espouse a balanced position between Israel and Palestine, to suggest that Israel comply with international law or to speak in defence of justice or human rights for Palestinians."

Carter was openly supportive of the work of academics Stephen Walt and John Mearsheimer, fellow proponents of the notion that thanks to the efforts of the pro-Israel lobby, Israel does not face scrutiny in the United States even though Jerusalem's policies are bad for America. The duo, whose own book is set to be released in September, has gone even further than Carter, arguing that the "Israel Lobby" played a lead role – presumably for Jerusalem's benefit – in pushing America into the Iraq war.

Two other flaps put Jewish organizations on the defensive against the claim that they vigorously work to shut down debate on Israel.

First, in October, after discussions with the Anti-Defamation League and the American Jewish Committee, the Polish consulate in New York pulled the plug on an event sponsored by an outside group that was to feature Tony Judt, a British-born New York University professor who sparked outrage with a 2003 essay criticizing the creation of a Jewish state.

Soon after, Judt created a firestorm with a harshly worded mass e-mail blaming the cancellation on the ADL's national director, Abraham Foxman. In the end, it appears that Foxman's office simply inquired to see if the consulate was sponsoring the event (it wasn't), while the AJC's executive director, David Harris, pressed for the event to be canceled.

But AJC soon took centre stage in a similar controversy, after the organization published an essay by Indiana University professor Alvin Rosenfeld. The essay documented what he described as a rising tide of anti-Israel polemics within

Diminishing dominance of local Jewish federations

"progressive Jewish" thought. In the face of the ensuing brouhaha, the AJC said it was a mistake to include syndicated columnist Richard Cohen in the essay, but otherwise stuck to its guns. The New York Times ran a story painting the essay as an assault on liberals by a "conservative" organization, but subsequently issued a correction, saying it had unfairly characterized the political leanings of the AJC.

The AJC touted the correction, but it seemed a pyrrhic victory, offering temporary solace in the face of a seemingly undeniable trend: respectable voices in the wider society increasingly view Jewish organizations as parochial interest groups rather than standard-bearers of a moral cause.

Less jarring, but nonetheless symbolically important, was the community's highest-profile religious development of the year: the December decision by the Conservative movement's top lawmaking body to permit the ordination of gay and lesbian rabbis as well as the performance of same-sex ceremonies.

The movement's West Coast seminary moved quickly to open its doors to gay and lesbian rabbinical students, with the Jewish Theological Seminary of America in New York following suit in March.

A few of the more traditionalist members of the Law Committee resigned, and voices of opposition were heard in branches of the movement in other countries. But the decision sparked little controversy in Conservative synagogues across the United States, especially compared to the tense fallout from the movement's decision more than two decades ago to ordain women.

While only a small number of rabbis and congregations were vocally upset over the decision, few people are likely to benefit directly from it.

Instead, the new policy carries tremendous symbolic importance, most notably in how it punctuates a decades-long shift in the religious landscape of Jewish life in America. Throughout much of the 20th century, Conservative leaders viewed their movement as an ideological and sociological middle ground between the respective extremes of the Reform and the Orthodox.

But the decision to drop the ban on gay ordination and same-sex unions provides a powerful confirmation that the bridge connecting the denominations is crumbling, leaving a widening gap between Orthodoxy and everything else.

The question going forward is no longer whether Conservative Judaism will hold the centre, but whether it will win, or at least not lose any more ground, in the battle with the Reform movement for the hearts and minds of the vast majority of American Jews who fall on the liberal side of the divide with the Orthodox.

Just as 5767 highlighted the changing denominational map, this past year saw a string of moves that reflected the diminishing dominance of local Jewish charitable federations and their national arm, the United Jewish Communities (UJC). For several decades the federation movement was the unchallenged force in determining the community's spending priorities.

But in recent years mega donors and private foundations have often taken the lead – and several developments this year suggest that this trend will only intensify.

The year started out with a big bang: Yeshiva University announced that its immediate past chairman, fertilizer and oil magnate Ronald Stanton, was giving $100 million to the school – believed to be the largest amount of money ever pledged to a Jewish cause.

The UJC is restructuring

"I'm sorry that this is the largest gift ever" to a Jewish organization, Stanton said. "There are plenty of people who could do it, but most substantial philanthropy goes to non-Jewish causes."

Other donors made news, including William Davidson, owner of the Detroit Pistons and president of Guardian Industries Corp. of Auburn Hills, Mich., and his wife, Karen, who pledged $75 million for a new in-patient tower at Hadassah's Jerusalem hospital.

Though not as lavish, two $15-million pledges were significant in terms of underscoring the lead role that private family foundations are playing. One of the pledges was from the Charles and Lynn Schusterman Family Foundation to Brandeis University for the creation of an interdisciplinary Israel curriculum, at a time when Jewish students and communal officials are grappling with anti-Israel sentiment on campus and Arab-funded Middle Eastern studies programs are growing.

The other $15-million pledge – from the Harry and Jeanette Weinberg Foundation to help cover tuition costs at 12 Jewish day schools in Baltimore – was cheered by Jewish education advocates as a potential philanthropic model for tackling the major financial challenges faced by day schools.

Fifteen million dollars was also the magic number for the Foundation for Jewish Camping, which received an anonymous donation of that amount from a donor in Chicago. In addition, the camping outfit scored a $11.2-million grant from the Jim Joseph Foundation for preteens in communities west of the Rockies – the splashiest yet as it moves forward with plans to give away $25 million annually.

This would be enough for any year, but 5767 marked the opening of the foundation of casino mogul Sheldon Adelson and his wife, Miriam. The couple are reportedly planning to dole out $200 million a year to Jewish causes – dwarfing the amount raised annually by any local federation except for New York.

The Adelsons pledged $60 million this year to birthright israel and gave $4.5 million to the Shalem Center in Jerusalem for a star-studded institute that will seek to deal with issues facing Israel and western civilization, including nationalism, terrorism, identity and the spreading of human rights and democracy.

The UJC is not standing still. It passed a $40.2-million budget, allocating a significant portion to a restructuring plan aimed at boosting the sagging annual campaigns of local federations; the plan also seeks to build on the success of the UJC's $360 million Israel Emergency Campaign by beefing up the organization's office in Israel.

Federations also are working to adapt to the changing philanthropic universe, where individual donors and foundations have the ability to give more in a year than entire communities raise in their annual fundraising campaigns.

Many – like the Baltimore federation, which is giving $1 million per year to day schools in conjunction with the Weinberg foundation – are seeking to leverage their expertise and influence to forge partnerships with these independent players. Similar efforts are underway in cities such as Boston and Chicago, where federations are working with outside donors to develop innovative approaches to funding Jewish education.

In general – from political activism to religion and philanthropy – the past year demonstrated that the rules of the game are changing dramatically, often rapidly. Looking ahead, the question is which individuals, institutions and movements will figure out how to adjust.

From recovery to renaissance: New Orleans Jews look ahead

By GAIL NARON CHALEW
JTA

NEW ORLEANS — The Jewish community of New Orleans has used the two years since hurricane Katrina not only to recover from the devastation but also to plot the course for what it hopes will be a future renaissance.

Key to this revitalization is a program of grants and incentives to lure 1,000 Jewish individuals and families to the area from around the country. This program is the first fruit of an intensive planning process that has involved several hundred members of the Jewish community.

When Katrina struck in late August 2005, the nearly 10,000 Jews in the community were hit hard, as was the rest of New Orleans. The massive hurricane damaged 80 per cent of their homes, 70 per cent of their businesses and several key community institutions.

Since then, the Jewish communal infrastructure has largely been sustained by more than $20 million in donations from the United Jewish Communities, the umbrella of the North American federation system, the national religious movements, along with donations from hundreds of individual synagogues, federations and donors.

But as of December 2007, the New Orleans Jewish community, which has lost about 30 per cent of its members, must stand on its own two feet.

Michael Weil, a strategic planner drawn from Israel to head the Jewish Federation of Greater New Orleans, says the challenge is immense but the community is determined to look ahead.

"There is no sense in going back to where we were before the storm. We have the opportunity now to make past dreams and new dreams of a vibrant Jewish New Orleans come true."

Early evidence suggests that the Jewish community is rising to the challenge. The federation's current annual campaign, the first since Katrina, is on track to raise more than $2.6 million, compared to the $2.8 million raised among significantly more members in the last pre-Katrina campaign.

Plans are underway to centralize services, share space and eliminate overlaps among community institutions. "Everyone is sitting around the table now. There is wall-to-wall collaboration," Weil says. One example is that a discussion is underway to merge the community day school and the Chabad-Lubavitch day school.

The federation has hired a grant writer and has engaged an Israeli public relations firm to do marketing on a pro bono basis, branding New Orleans as a "pioneering, exciting and fun community," in Weil's words.

The incentive package to attract newcomers will include housing and business loans, moving grants, scholarships to the community day school, free or reduced membership at synagogues and local Jewish organizations, and a job search network.

Funded mostly by outside philanthropists, the incentive program is headed by Nathan Rothstein, himself a newcomer to the community.

Most people are optimistic

During his senior year at the University of Massachusetts-Amherst, he came to New Orleans on a Hillel-sponsored volunteer mission, experienced the needs first-hand and knew that "here was a place where I could take on a leadership role and have an immediate impact."

To guide the federation in its planning efforts, Louisiana State University sociologist Rick Weil last fall surveyed both current residents and those who had relocated elsewhere. After the summer, he will be conducting a full-scale demographic study.

His results of last fall's survey were surprisingly favourable, indicating that those who are back are likely to stay and that only 15 per cent of those who have left are very unlikely to return.

"The Jewish community is showing a huge amount of toughness," the professor says. "According to every measure of stress – trouble sleeping or concentrating, worrying and eating too much – they are experiencing way more than under normal circumstances. And the more damage they sustained to their homes or businesses, the more stress.

"Yet, at the same time, they are showing great resilience. One interesting finding is that the one form of support that was consistently effective in helping people cope with stress was regular synagogue attendance."

Weil found in his survey that most people are optimistic that New Orleans will recover. Although 40 per cent of respondents reported receiving job offers in other communities, many of those decided to stay in New Orleans.

At the same time, the reported brain drain of many professionals from the city has not occurred in the Jewish community. Doctors, lawyers and other professionals have returned in the same proportion as the rest of the Jewish community.

But whether Jewish New Orleans will indeed experience a renaissance will depend on the ability of the community to retain its current residents and attract new ones.

Understanding that the Jewish community cannot flourish if the levees are not strengthened and the soaring crime rate does not decline, many New Orleans Jews have become community activists.

As Shellye Farber, an accountant and the past president of the New Orleans section of the National Council of Jewish Women, put it, "Ultimately, we cannot control those larger issues. What we can control is making Jewish New Orleans a more attractive and exciting place to be."

Rabbi Uri Topolsky, the former associate rabbi of the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale in New York, will be another key player in that effort. He recently moved to New Orleans this summer with his wife, Dahlia, and two children to become the rabbi at Congregation Beth Israel, the Orthodox congregation that was flooded by 10 feet of water just two years ago.

He is launching his own recruitment campaign geared to Orthodox Jewish families. Its tagline quotes Rabbi Nachman of Breslov, the 18th-century chassidic leader, who said, "If you believe in the ability to destroy, you can believe in the ability to rebuild."

Autistic children get an Israeli 'biohug'

By DAVID BRINN

For Raffi Rembrand, necessity was definitely the mother of his invention. An Israeli engineer and father of a son with autism, Rembrand was well aware of the difficulties of raising children with this disorder.

He had devoured all the information indicating that a treatment known as deep pressure touch can have a calming effect in agitated individuals with autism. However, he discovered that most existing devices were like straitjackets, not sensitive to changes in the patient's movement, and could not regulate the pressure applied according to the patient's needs or body reactions.

An inventor by nature, Rembrand began tinkering in his home until he came up with the idea of a light, wearable, vest-like calming device that is both portable and non-restraining.

Working through a few prototypes of his "home remedy" makeshift device he developed the BioHug – a vest for both people with autism and children diagnosed with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD).

The BioHug delivers a mildly pulsating pressure through inflatable cells placed in the garment and includes a biofeedback mechanism that automatically regulates the level of stimulation.

According to the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta, one out of every 150 children in the United States suffers from a disorder that falls somewhere on the autism spectrum, ranging from Asperger's syndrome to children who are very limited by their autism. ADHD is much more prevalent, however, with millions of children diagnosed with the learning disorder.

'A simple idea which might help'

"It was very much an improvisational exercise," Rembrand says, describing how he developed the BioHug. "The idea of inflatable bubble cells is used for people with pressure wounds to keep them from getting infected. I took a little from here and a little from there. There wasn't any patent, it was just a nice development.

"I approached ALUT [the Israeli Society for Autistic Children] and said, 'Here's a simple idea which might help the kids – I've tested it on my son, and on other people with autism.'"

They were so impressed that they implored Rembrand to develop a scientifically tested, professional device that could be made available to all people with autism.

He approached Dr. Einat Gal, a clinical researcher at the University of Haifa, who continues to collaborate on the development of the BioHug

Still, Rembrand wasn't satisfied. "Everyone told me, 'You know, this invention is way too simple.' It has a very low technological barrier,' so I said, 'OK, if this is what needs to be done, I'll add some technology to it' – which is how we came to include biofeedback."

Rembrand says the device measures the user's stress, and that stress actually controls the BioHug's pressure and pulsation rate. A change in the stress counter will cause the pulsation rate and amount of pressure to adjust.

The device measures the user's stress

Earlier this year, Rembrand founded BioHug Technologies Ltd. to commercialize the device and was accepted into the Chief Scientist of Israel incubator program, through L.N. Innovative Technologies in Haifa.

He also found a kindred soul in Andrew Schiffmiller, a veteran manager and consultant, who took up the position of CEO of the new company.

"The BioHug is unique among all other types of pressure-based devices for people with autism because we solve the problem of habituation," Schiffmiller told ISRAEL21c.

"Try it yourself – gently pinch your wrist – you feel it, but if you keep doing it, after a short while you don't feel it anymore. Your body gets used to it. Through the pulsation feature on the BioHug, we reduce the habituation, so the sensation of pressure on the user will continue, because it's always changing."

Schiffmiller says the original reason Rembrand, who acts as BioHug's chief technological officer, invented the concept wasn't just to keep his son calm, but to conduct tests on a theory he had researched regarding hearing.

"There's a body of suggestive evidence that people with autism hear differently than other people. When you put a shell to your ear and you think you hear the ocean, it's called otoacoustic emissions. [It's] produced by the inner ear itself, which is thought to have some role in filtering out background noise," Schiffmiller explained.

"The working theory was that there's a difference in the otoacoustic emissions of people with autism. If that's true and you can quantify it, then you can have a purely empirical way of diagnosing autism – even in infants."

'Still revising the design'

But the problem is, how do you get naturally fidgety people with autism to sit still long enough to conduct an ear exam? According to Rembrand and Schiffmiller, the BioHug is the solution.

They are still revising the design of the BioHug before they actually begin clinical testing, discussing issues such as whether the compressor will be in the vest or in an accompanying backpack, and other design issues. But the feedback they have received from students with autism who have tried the device and from professionals in the field, indicates that they are on the right track.

"Every time we build a prototype, we go back to the Horsha school for children with autism that Rafi has a good relationship with, we give it to the staff, they play with, try it on and give us their suggestions," Schiffmiller said. "Since these are people that work with children with autism every day and they themselves are experienced in the application of the pressure, they've been great sounding boards for us."

"And they're still using my first prototype at the school," Rembrand added.

Both Schiffmiller and Rembrand are confident that the BioHug represents a huge leap in the field of controlled pressure devices for patients with autism. Some devices are based on the principle of weight, where weighted garments place pressure on the user's shoulders. But Schiffmiller claims there are two drawbacks to that type of therapy.

"One is the issue of habituation. After a few minutes, you don't really feel it. And two, in order to be effective, the total weight needs to about 10 per cent of the wearer's body weight – that's heavy, especially if you're talking about adults."

There's also a device invented a decade ago by Temple Grandin, a very high-functioning person with autism in the United States, who created a machine whose concept was based on restraining chutes used for cattle.

"As a child, she always craved pressure. Once when she was visiting her uncle's farm, she saw him using a restraining chute for the cattle, and she climbed in and found that the pressure helped calm her," Schiffmiller explained.

"Her device is large and cumbersome – about 350 pounds and uses an industrial air compressor. What Rafi has done, in essence, is to miniaturize that process into the BioHug."

Depending on the population, the BioHug can function in a number of different ways, Schiffmiller said. For students with ADHD, it could be worn at homework time to help the user to concentrate and stay on task. And for people with autism who sometimes suffer through periods of severe agitation, it can bea tool to help them calm down.

"With some people with autism, the possibility exists that they may hurt themselves or hurt others, and the BioHug is an effective way to get them to relax," he said.

Rembrand is confident that the BioHug will prove useful for the families of children with autism. And he only has to look as far as his own son, Jacob, now 23 years old.

"He's my primary beta tester. And if he says it's good, then we know it's good."

Former Montrealer builds Second Temple model.

By SHARON KANON
IPS

No one needed a GPS in ancient times to find Jerusalem. With its gleaming white marble, the Holy Temple in Jerusalem was one of the most magnificent wonders of the ancient world, a magnetic draw for kings and pilgrims.

A fascinating new model of the Second Temple, originally built by the master builder Herod, displays the awesome grandeur of the sacred edifice and its multi-purpose function and symbolism as the centre of Jewish religious and national existence.

"I felt that I was not alone, as if there was an invisible hand directing and guiding me," said former Montrealer Chaim Rosenberg, 55, a logistics administrator at Elta Electronics, Israel's highly sophisticated radar communications company, and a secular Jew. "I felt that I was creating a holy work, particularly when I worked through the night."

"It took me six months to decide to do it," Rosenberg said after fellow worker Yosef Zaklas, a Canadian-born engineer and an enthusiastic Chabad supporter, saw Rosenberg's model of an American battleship – consisting of more than 14,000 matchsticks – and suggested the idea to him.

"I didn't know anything about the Temple when the project was first suggested to me," Rosenberg said. "Then I began collecting material, reading books and attending lectures."

He pulled out a beautifully illustrated book about the Temple written by Rabbi Yisrael Ariel of the Temple Institute.

"Daniel Michelson, an applied maths professor at the Weizmann Institute of Science, has been researching the Temple for 10 years," said Zaklas. A virtual model "with the correct dimensions" of the Temple appears on his website – www.truthofland.co.il – along with many articles. "I thought to myself, 'How could Chaim go wrong?'"

Rosenberg's daughter, Riki, an architect who is now studying for an advanced degree, provided the precise drawings for the Second Temple reproduction – a 1:100 replica (measuring 2.3 x 1.3 metres).

"I began work around 5:30 each evening, after getting home from work, and often worked through until 3 a.m. Once I started something, I had to finish it. I wanted every piece to be accurate."

One particular project that required great precision was the making of more than 220 Corinthian columns.

One of Rosenberg's first jobs was to build the walls that enclosed the Court of the Women, a misnomer for what was actually an open plaza used for various activities on festivals (the women were located in the balcony on the second tier). In its four corners were four enclosures – a chamber where the priests sorted wood; a chamber for lepers who had been healed, bathed and declared clean by the priests; a chamber where oil and wine were preserved, and a chamber for those who had fulfilled the vow of the Nazarites and shaved their heads.

'Taking pride in the details'

To build the model – which was made from oak, white Chinese pine, spring timber and maple – Rosenberg looked for just the right saw.

"I like symmetry and precision. Curiously, I found the saw I needed in a fish shop," he said, and he demonstrated his skill with it by cutting a semi-circle free-hand.

Fifteen semicircular steps at the western side of the Women's Court led up to Nicanor's Gate. "On these steps the Levites, who assisted the Kohanim, sang the beautiful Shir Hama'alot psalms," Rosenberg said.

The fifteen semicircular steps at the western side of the Women's Court, which led up to Nicanor's Gate. On the other side of the gate was the altar for sacrifices.

According to a midrash in the Talmud, when storms threatened the ship on which Nicanor was transporting the heavy doors for the Temple from Alexandria, Egypt, to Israel, the captain decided to throw one of the doors overboard.

When high waves continued, the captain threatened to throw the second door overboard. "If you throw the door overboard, you will have to throw me too," said Nicanor. When the ship finally arrived in the port of Akko in Israel, Nicanor found the second door miraculously attached to the ship.

On the inside of the door, Rosenberg placed two golden cherubim – angel-like figures with upward wings (seeking a higher Godly purpose), one male and one female, symbolizing the importance of Torah and human interaction. This motif was used both on the Ark in which the Torah tablets were originally placed and repeatedly in the Tabernacle.

The area on the other side of Nicanor's Gate had three sections: the Court of the Israelites (for Jewish men only), the altar for sacrifices, and the Court of the Priests. On the upper level were cubicles where the Sanhedrin court met. They were also used as rooms for the priests and as a geniza (an archive of Hebrew manuscripts).

"The Temple was a grand structure on a raised platform in the centre of the Temple Mount and stood 50 metres high – an impressive sacred area," Rosenberg said.

The historian Josephus wrote that its outer walls were covered with massive plates of gold and that it was divided into three parts: a foyer, the Holy Room with the Golden Menorah (until it was stolen); the showbread and a gold altar; and a separate room for the Holy of Holies.

Taking pride in the details, Rosenberg points to the niche where a priest blew the trumpet to signal the approach and the end of the Sabbath.

"He who has not seen Herod's Temple in Jerusalem has not seen a beautiful building," the sages said in the Talmud (Bava Batra 4a). To his credit, Herod followed Halachah in constructing the Temple. Not to give the builder too much credit, it should be noted that Herod (a non-Jewish king appointed by the Romans – he probably paid for the position) had taxed the Jews highly for other projects and had killed many priests. The Temple may have been a gesture to the Jews, but it enhanced his own reputation.

One of the largest man-made sacred compounds in antiquity, the Herodian Temple covered a 36-acre area and was double the size of Solomon's Temple. The Western Wall is one of the four retaining walls that was built to enlarge the Temple Mount. It was also a major improvement over the poorly reconstructed Temple built by Zerubbabel when the Jews returned from Babylon with Ezra and Nechemiah.

According to sources, it took seven years to build Solomon's Temple, while it took 46 to 80 years, according to different estimates, to build Herod's Temple. Some 180,000 people made pilgrimages to the Second Temple during each of the festivals. Non-Jews were also allowed within its walls, up to a point.

Built on Mount Moriah, where Adam and Eve were created, sinned and repented by bringing a sacrifice; where Abraham brought Isaac in the fateful test of faith; and where the Holy Temple in Jerusalem, the abode of the Ark of the Covenant in the First Temple, it was a holy focal point of the Jewish People.

Imagine a visit to the Temple 2,000 years ago – the religious and judicial center of the Jewish world. People came to the Sanhedrin Courts to plead their cases and pay their half-shekel taxes. They came to the mikvahs to wash before entering the Temple compound, and they came to the Temple, which teemed with activity, to pray – it was the preferred place for prayer during the Second Temple period. (Today, outside of Jerusalem, it is customary to face the city three times a day during prayers. In Jerusalem, prayer is said facing the Temple Mount.)

It was in the Temple that the Kohanim made their ritual offerings and the people brought their offerings to give thanks and expiate their sins, and where they celebrated the Sabbath and special festivals with dancing and song. Here, too, the shofar was sounded on Rosh Hashanah and the First Fruits were brought at harvest time.

One of the happiest celebrations was Simchat Beit Hashoeva (Rejoicing at the Place of the Water-Drawing), performed every morning throughout Sukkot, which involved pouring water from the pool of Shiloach in the City of David on the altar in order to invoke God's blessing for rain. On Yom Kippur, the Kohen HaGadol (the High Priest) entered the Holy of Holies to ask for Divine forgiveness for the people's sins.

Bezalel was only 13 years old when God chose him to supervise construction of the elaborate portable Tabernacle, a pre-Temple that the Jews carried during their wanderings in the desert. Empowered with miraculous divine abilities, with "Godly spirit… wisdom, insight and knowledge and with every craft" (Exodus 31:3), Bezalel carried out the enormous project detailed in three chapters. He rested only on Shabbat.

The year-long experience of building the Temple model also had a remarkable impact on the secular Rosenberg.

"I want people, especially secular Jews, to understand what the Holy Temple really was – to know that we came from this place, to know our roots, our destiny. The Temple sent out a message of confidence to the nation. It is a message we need today."

(The "blueprint" drawings for the First Temple are said to have been given by God to Moses and handed down throughout the generations. The Talmud and the writings of Josephus Flavius are the prime source of specifications for Herod's Second Temple.)

Community kitchen a successful business incubator

By WENDY ELLIMAN
IPS

Since October 2006, eight women from disadvantaged backgrounds have spent their mornings preparing tasty nutritious meals for 210 mentally challenged adults at the Israel-Elwyn Rehabilitation Center in Jerusalem, and many of their afternoons and evenings developing their own catering businesses in Israel's competitive culinary market.

"The community kitchen at Elwyn is the 'graduate stage' of our 'Women Cook Up A Business' program," said Ella Ben Yossef, head of social services projects for the Jerusalem Foundation, which provided much of the funding for the community kitchen and for the 18-month training courses that preceded it.

"It is a highly original and effective model that will be widely replicable once we have overcome the problems of combining an economic undertaking with the facts on the ground."

Cook Up A Business, which aims to help mature women enter the job market, earn a steady income and raise their status at home, was launched two years ago in Jerusalem's socially and economically depressed Kiryat Yovel neighborhood by the Kol Ha'Isha (Woman's Voice) and Achoti (My Sister) women's organizations

"It's a project that adapts the micro-business model to women who excel in home cooking, and so turns a low-image skill into a prestigious and marketable occupation," said Orna Hadar, director of the Kol Ha'Isha Jerusalem Women's Center.

The project began with a course that taught business practices along with food skills – bookkeeping, pricing, marketing, economic planning, defining a business and its market, self-empowerment and self-presentation.

As the course ended, however, it became clear, Hadar said, that an intermediate stage was needed between the classroom and the business world.

Rimon, a community kitchen member, tells a group of supporters from the United States about the dessert liqueurs that she makes and the gift package she developed for Rosh Hashanah as part of her own culinary business.

"We came up with the idea of a community kitchen that would function as a safe, supportive and enabling business incubator, while providing working conditions as close as possible to the business reality," she said.

An agreement was made with the Elwyn Rehabilitation Center in south Jerusalem to have the women modernize, re-equip and work from their kitchen, preparing 210 meals, five mornings a week. The kitchen thus operates as a co-operative business enterprise, while the women develop skills and gain real-life experience with an eye toward entering the business world on their own.

In the afternoons, the kitchen is open to all course graduates and gives them a place where they can cook for their own businesses – a supportive framework that has both Health Ministry and kashrut certification.

'A major achievement'

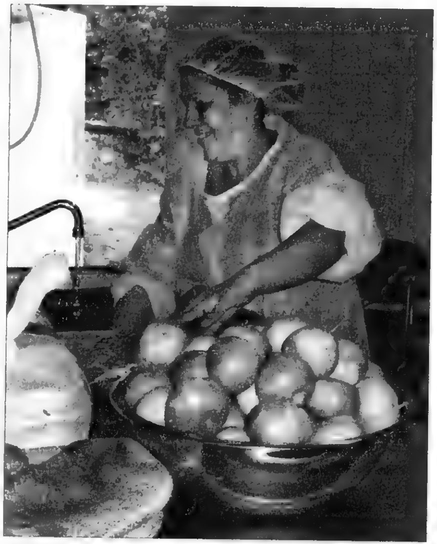
Events catered are large and small, formal and informal. One recent party was for industrialist and Jerusalem City Councillor Nir Barkat.

With the High Holy Days approaching, the women were expecting a rush of clients.

"When I heard about the course, my life was at rock-bottom," said Sivan, who at 53 is one of the oldest participants. "My husband was unemployed and I'd just got through treatment for breast cancer. I wanted to get back to work and to being me, but I'd lost my self-confidence and couldn't do either. The course was amazing, both for what it taught me and for making us part of a community of supportive women. When it ended, though, I didn't know what to do. I leapt at the chance of working in a community kitchen."



Rosette, an unemployed mother of four who graduated from the "Women Cook Up A Business" program and is a member of the community kitchen, has new hope for economic stability.

[IPS photos by Rita Mendes-Flohr]

Sivan, like the other seven women who have run the kitchen since it opened last fall, works there two days a week. Between them, they have developed efficient and quality menus, according to their varied culinary specialties. Their salaries include social benefits and provide a dependable income while they develop their own businesses.

"The responsibility given to women has steadily increased," Hadar said. "Everyone takes a turn as 'director of the month,' planning meals, ensuring that provisions are ordered and arrive on time, as well as dealing with suppliers, bookkeeping and finances."

The fact that everything has gone so smoothly is in itself a major achievement, said the project's business manager, Batya Cnaani.

"It wasn't easy for eight inexperienced women to organize themselves to cook 210 palatable meals daily, serve them in three shifts, while learning about working with one another and the kashrut supervisor," she said.

Learning to work with the members of the Elwyn day-care community has been an added challenge.

"You need strength and caring to work with mentally-challenged people," said Yemima, another community kitchen participant.

"Not all of them would stand in line for the food at the beginning, many can't balance their trays, quite a few are on special diets, and if we run even a bit late they don't understand and get rowdy. But we've come to know each other, and many of them come to tell us that they love our food."

In April, two Elwyn women joined the catering team to set tables and help with cooking – giving the kitchen, in Hadar's words, "added social value."

Although Rosh Hashanah marks only the first year of the community kitchen, all those involved see nothing but expansion ahead.

"This year, we hope to provide lunches to other educational frameworks in the area that have a long study day," Ella Ben Yossef said.

At the same time, the women's independent businesses are also taking off.

"Working in the kitchen and starting my own business has changed my life," said Rimon, who makes special dessert liqueurs (pomegranates, cherry with almond and strawberry) and was developing a gift package to be marketed before Rosh Hashanah.

"It's like a complete cleansing of the spirit, from the bottom up. I'm full of new energy and love of life. I was in a terrible state when I started. Things were really hard at home. We had legal and money problems, my daughter was failing in school, and I was working as a cleaner to put food on the table. I knew the project was for me the moment I heard about it. I was one of the very first to register my own business – and the only cleaning I do now is in my own house!" she added.

"I'm at the point where I know it's up to me to go forward alone," said Sivan. "But I can do it knowing there are people who'll help and who care about me. I love what I've learned. I live for it – for the colour, the opportunity to meet people, the chance to open my heart and mind and to look at a table and see people enjoying a meal I've prepared."

Israel is a leader in stem cell research

REHOVOT — A growing number of Israel's startups in the biotech sector seek to transform innovative stem cell research into marketable products.

And Israeli scientists have published more stem cell research articles per capita than any other country in the world, according to The Scientist magazine.

Stem cells promise a revolution in medical treatment, said Dov Zipori, director of the Helen and Martin Kimmel Institute for Stem Cell Research at the Weizmann Institute of Science.

"There was a time when if your car had a problem, the garage mechanic would fiddle with the faulty part and try and mend it," he said.

"Now everything is modular. The mechanic simply takes out the faulty part and puts in a new one. Stem cells offer us the potential to do the same in medicine. In theory, if a person has disorder in their liver, heart or lung, instead of trying to cure it, we could transplant a new one."

This would radically change the current situation; today, there are not enough new organs to go around for those who need lifesaving operations, let alone people requiring severe corrective surgery.

Stem cells also have the potential for renewing all our cells and tissues, and will be available for treating almost the full range of human diseases, conditions and disabilities. They include Parkinson's and Alzheimer's diseases, spinal cord injury, stroke, burns, heart disease, diabetes, osteoarthritis and rheumatoid arthritis.

Stem cells have fascinated biologists for decades because of their remarkable potential to develop into many different cell types in the body. Serving as a sort of repair system for the body, they can theoretically divide without limit to replenish other cells as long as the person is still alive. They are available from three sources – mature human blood, cord blood and, most controversially, embryos. Christian authorities, both Protestant and Catholic, have traditionally taken a more rigorous definition of the start of life than even the more conservative Orthodox rabbis, and as a result, the United States was forbidden from granting federal funds for stem cell research using embryos until 2002. Even today, such assistance is severely limited.

This gives Israel – where the government does fund stem cell research – a competitive advantage over the United States, but Zipori stresses that even so, vast amounts of private American capital does support research.

Shortly before his death in 2004, actor Christopher Reeve, who had been paralyzed from the neck down in an accident while horseback riding, spent five days at the Weizmann Institute participating in stem cell testing for spinal injuries. The principle aim of the visit was to publicize the importance of stem cell research for the future benefit of mankind, to emphasize Israel's leading position in the area and to chastise the United States for being slow to exploit the advantages that stem cell therapy can bring.

Zipori takes little comfort in Israel's "competitive advantage" because he feels that major American federal support for stem cell research is required to make the dream of stem cell transplants a reality sooner rather than later.

"There are a number of major obstacles that must be overcome before the dream is realized," said Zipori. "Principal obstacles include the need to generate far larger volumes of stem cells than are presently available and to enhance matching so that the recipient body, following a transplant, does not eventually reject cells."

Zipori's own research focuses on this need to proliferate stem cells and for better matching. These are areas in which Israel is a world leader, and Israeli biotech startup companies have already commercialized their patents, which promise methodologies for producing vast amounts of stem cells that can be better matched up with recipients.

Gamida-Cell Ltd., which strives to overcome the problem of generating quantity in creating enough stem cells for effective future treatments, is a leader in the expansion of stem cell therapeutics. It is currently in clinical development for cancer and autoimmune diseases, as well as future regenerative cell-based medicines, including heart-and-pancreatic tissue repair.

Pluristem is another important Israeli firm in this sector. Pluristem is developing a proprietary stem cell expansion technology for the treatment of severe blood disorders. Their first product is intended to resolve the global shortfall of matched tissue for bone marrow transplantation, by improving the engraftment (new cell growth) of stem cells contained in umbilical cord blood.

BrainStorm Cell Therapeutics is developing stem cell technologies to provide solutions for incurable neuro-degenerative diseases.

Israel has always been in the forefront of stem cell research. The first breakthrough in the development of stem cells occurred in the 1960s at the Weizmann Institute when Leo Sachs and his Australian colleagues were the first in the world to produce stem cells from blood. This formed a platform on which stem cell research developed in Israel.

Zipori said Sachs' research breakthrough paved the way for the bone marrow replacement treatment for leukemia and other illnesses – the first practical fruit of stem cell research, which he currently estimates to have about a 50 per cent success rate.

Israeli research teams are world leaders in attempting to proliferate stem cells. In 1998, Joseph Itskovitz-Eldor, then with the Technion, Institute of Technology in Haifa, and today of the Rambam Medical Center in Haifa, was one of the first scientists to produce stem cells from human embryos, while a team led by Binyamin Reubinof of Hadassah University Medical Center also pioneered the production of stem cells from embryos. Today, Itskovitz-Eldor, Reubinof and Nissim Benvenisty of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem all lead important groups studying stem cell embryos.

"This field of research has never been as vibrant and as vivid and as exciting as it is today," said Zipori. "The prospects of translating stem cell research into medically applicable technologies are high. But it will all take time."

In addition to the practical use for stem cells in medicine in the form of bone marrow transplants, more recently, initial trials in the use of mesenchymal (connective tissue cells) have generated encouraging results in the treatment of osteogenesis imperfecta, a congenital disorder in children, as well as benefits for heart infarction. But for the most part, stem cell treatment is an idea that works in theory but in practice still has a way to go.

Stem cell modular transplants won't become routine surgery in the near future –"it is not going to happen in the next five or ten years," Zipori said – "but it is going to happen."
